The ſame day the council made another act containing the rules to be obſerved by all who were indulged. As 1. They muſt not marry or baptize except thoſe who belong to their reſpective pariſhes, or to any neighbouring pariſhes if vacant. 2. They muſt adminiſter the Lord's ſupper on one and the ſame day, and admit none to partake with them from other pariſhes, without a certificate from the miniſters thereof. 3. They muſt preach only in the church, under the pain of being puniſhed as keepers of conventicles. 4. They muſt not go out of their pariſhes without a licence from the biſhop of the dioceſe only. 5. That, as to diſcipline, all ſuch caſes as were formerly referable to preſbyteries muſt continue ſtill in the ſame manner; and where there is no preſbyterial meeting, that theſe caſes be referred to the preſbytery of the next bounds. 6. That the ordinary dues payable to burſers, clerks of preſbyteries and ſynods, be paid by the ſaid miniſters as formerly.

There was a third act of council made the ſame day, relating to the reſt of the ejected miniſters not as yet indulged, by which they were required to hear the word, and communicate in thoſe pariſh churches where they reſided, or elſe to remove to ſome other pariſhes, where they can hear and communicate, under the pain of impriſonment. This act diſcharged all other preſbyterian miniſters, except the indulged, from exerciſing any part of the miniſterial function, under what puniſhment the council ſhall think proper to inflict; and the ſheriffs and other magiſtrates were commanded to examine into the conduct of the indulged, with reſpect to their obſerving the rules above mentioned, and make report every ſix months, and ſome time before the firſt of June enſuing.

When the account of theſe acts came abroad, many miniſters were diſatisfied. And at a meeting of about 13, which was held at Edinburgh about a day or two after, it was propoſed, and all the brethren preſent declared themſelves againſt it. But this being found to be a matter of general concern, another meeting was appointed for the 24th of September, and the letters were ſent to ſeveral miniſters in the country to attend and deliver their ſentiments as to this matter.

Mean while, as one great deſign of the indulgence was the ſuppreſſing of conventicles, ſo, on the 16th, 'the commiſſioner and council gave a warrant to the lord chancellor, the archbiſhop of St Andrews, duke Hamilton, the earls of Argyll, Athol, Tweeddale, Kincardin, and Dundonald, the preſident, regiſter, advocate, treaſurer depute, juſtice clerk, or any four of them, to meet and give proper orders for executing the acts of council againſt the outed miniſters, and for preventing and ſuppreſſing conventicles, and other diſturbances of the public peace of the church, with power to call perſons before them, commit them to priſon, and do all things neceſſary for theſe ends. In difficult caſes they are to conſult with the council.' But I can give no account of their proceedings.

To return then to the meeting of miniſters at Edinburgh the 24th of September, 32 met in Mr Thomas Hogg's room, and agreed that every one ſhould declare his opinion at the next meeting. Being again aſſembled at an after meeting, Mr John Inglis was choſen moderator. When the queſtion was put, Whether it was the duty of miniſters to go and exerciſe their miniſtry at their churches? four were of opinion that miniſters ought to go to their churches when they had once given their teſtimony againſt what was wrong in the indulgence, two were undetermined, and the reſt preſent were in the negative.

When copies of the council's acts came to the weſt, there were ſundry meetings; and many were for accepting of the indulgence providing a ſufficient teſtimony were given againſt the eraſtianiſm thereof. They all agreed, that but one miniſter ought to go to one pariſh, except in thoſe places where formerly there had been two. There were great debates concerning the teſtimony to be given in to the ſtate. At laſt Mr William Violant and Mr Alexander Wedderburn were appointed to draw up a paper to this purpose. They complied, and their paper, after some amendments, was generally liked at a meeting held at Irwin, in the month of October. I shall give the reader the following abstract of it.

Grievances as to the indulgence.

I. WE the ministers of Jesus Christ who have been debarred from our respective flocks——and restrained from the free exercise of our ministry these many years, do, with all thankfulness, acknowlege his most excellent majesty's royal favour in granting to some of us the public exercise of our ministry;——yet considering the offered indulgence, as contrived in the complex, and cast in its present mould in three acts of council, to be clogged with many involvements contrary to our principles and consciences, and with many inconveniences as to our persons and families, and to the congregations, both from which we are separated and to which we are assigned, we are exceedingly straitened in our liberty to accept of the same,—because the whole draught—appears to be nothing but the actual exercise of erastianism, in so far as the council is pleased, not only to dispose of persons and places, but to make application of persons to places for the exercise of their ministry, as if it were proper to the magistrate to judge of the spiritual state and condition of the people, of the qualifications of ministers,—and to form and prescribe rules;—so that the—yielding to these acts may be interpreted an homologating with and subjecting ourselves to erastianism, contrary to our known judgments in these matters.

II. Though we disallow all tumultuary and seditious meetings, which the meetings of the Lord's people for hearing his word cannot be reputed.—we are not a little grieved that the narrative of this present act seems to involve the accepters into an interpretative condemning of the same, which we dare not.

III. Albeit there be a very great necessity of a free call from the people.—yet the indulgence, as contrived, deprives the people of the liberty of a free election in so far as ministers are designed for them, and, by the council's act, peremptorily confined to the parishes, without so much as the previous knowlege of the people; and so a necessity is laid upon the people, either to call the confined or want a minister.

IV. This way offers violence to that special relation that is between pastors and people,—so that ministers formerly by violence pull'd away from their flocks,—are still kept divorced from one another, though this union and relation, being made up only by Jesus Christ acting in and by his church, can never be regularly dissolved by any other authority—than that which made it.

V. This—will prove grievous to the most part of the kingdom. 1. In that their own pastors are, without necessity, shut up from them in a corner, at a time when profanity, popery and quakerism are—spreading through the land—2. In that the people will have several necessary duties to perform for the accommodation and encouragement of two, which they will judge needless, one being sufficient for the charge.—3. It will prove afflicting to many brethren, in that, by it, they are obtruded upon other mens labours, without a necessity, to the detriment of the necessary maintenance of them and their families.—

VI. We acknowlege that the magistrate hath the power of confinement, and of all other—external punishments in actu signato,—but when he is to apply that power in actu exercito — we humbly conceive that the law of God,—of nature,—of nations, and——of the land, requires an orderly procedure, and allows the party the benefit of defence. But here, 1. this sentence contains punishment against persons without citations or—conviction of any crime or guilt, the like whereof is not done to the grossest of ill doers. 2. This sentence is drawn out, not against one person or two, but against all the presbyterian ministers in the kingdom, a very few excepted, which makes the practice without—a precedent in any reformed church. 3. The acts carry not only a confinement of our persons—but of our ministry, and we are hereby—bound up from the discharge of those duties we owe to our national church, and deprived not only of all benefit of mutual converse—in presbyteries, but also of more private communion with one another:—all which are—the more grievous to us, as they are trusted at a time when papists and quakers are so vigorously driving on their designs, without—any real or effectual restraint put upon them.—Though we know our confinement will put no blame upon us in the account of many—people,—yet the nature and tendency of it is weakening to the necessary reputation of ministers of Christ among the people, in that, by the same breath, ministers are permitted—to preach, and yet sentenced as evil doers—and all who get not a call from the people—will be exposed to far greater difficulties and sufferings than formerly.

VII. The declaration, in the close of the first act, will prove a grievous stroke to the peaceably disposed people of the kingdom, who have been longing for their pastors, when by it they shall see all hopes cut off of ever recovering them again.

VIII. We will not fall on a particular consideration of the rules of the act, which we cannot approve of, unless we would renounce our principles. All of them appear to be framed in favour of the conformed party, and to the disadvantage both of ministers and people of the presbyterian persuasion.—And as the whole draught is, at least, an interpretative subjection to erastianism, so the fifth and last rules, but especially the fifth, thrusts us under a direct and formal subjection to prelacy.

IX. We shall not mention how this is disrelished by the most part—who—adhere to the pure government of the church of Scotland; but the peremptory order given to sheriffs, and magistrates, to inquire how the ministers confined and allowed to preach do observe these rules, shews that the ministers who fail will be undoubtedly censured, according to their supposed demerits, and we, being straitened in our conscience to give obedience to these canons, judge it will be provoking to the magistrate, prejudicial to the people, and hurtful to ourselves, to step in, and within a short time to be thrust out again for our contravention."

They conclude with a humble request for the removal of the penal statutes, and for liberty without such restraints as are burdensom to their consciences and inconsistent with their principles.

About the end of October Mr Gabriel Cuningham with some others were sent to Edinburgh with this paper, to see if the brethren in the east, who appeared most averse to the indulgence, would concur with them in it. When Mr Cuningham presented it to them, they who were against the indulgence took it for a paper of reasons why the indulgence should not be complied with, and so it became the subject of debate. But viewing it more narrowly, and finding that it was a complaint of grievances, upon the presenting of which to the council the complainers resolved to comply with the indulgence, the meeting divided upon it. They that were against the indulgence said, that this was but a smooth way to help forward ministers who were clear to their churches. The others complained that the other party would not join with them in a testimony against what both reckoned sinful in the manner of granting the indulgence. They who could not comply answered, they were willing to testify jointly with them against what evils appeared in the indulgence, providing all would stand out and not accept. Sundry meetings were spent in these debates. Their last meeting was on the 23d of December, when they came to no agreement, so that the above paper was dropt. A good number of the ministers entered into the churches where they had been formerly, and others upon a call, where the congregation was vacant, with the consent of the ministers of the bounds. And since all hopes of a joint testimony was lost, several gave it from the pulpit upon their first entrance, declaring against the erastianism in the indulgence. And some of them fell under no small difficulties on this head, as we shall relate in its proper place.

During these debates, on the 5th of December, William Porterfield of Quarreltoun, having been a long time in prison for his accession to Pentland, petitioned for liberty, on account of his indisposition, and the great poverty to to which he was reduced. He was accordingly ſent from Edinburgh priſon to Dunbarton caſtle, and was ſuffered to go abroad in the day time upon giving bond and ſecurity under 10,000 merks to repair to the caſtle every night. During the laſt year and this, the lands of Barſob, and thoſe of Mr Gabriel Maxwell, with the eſtates of Rogland and Bedlane, were all forfeited on account of Pentland.

Several meaner perſons ſuffered during the courſe of this year. A poor pariſhioner of Abbotſrule was taken to be a ſoldier for not hearing the curate, and upon refuſing was fined in 100 l. Scots. John Ranken and James Dunlop in Eagleſham, James Brown in Muirzet, and John Foulis in Mearns, were brought in priſoners to Edinburgh, for alledged correſponding with, and receiving of ſome concerned in riots upon miniſters. The earls of Dumfries and Dundonald were appointed to examine into the affair.

Matters were managed much the ſame way through the year 1673. But ſuch was the partiality of the times to ſome, that though Mr Archibald Beeth curate in Arran, had ſhot one Allan Gardiner merchant in Irvine, for which he was condemned to be hanged at the croſs of Edinburgh, yet he was pardoned, and his remiſſion read in council on the 9th of January.

On the 6th of February, the council, in conſequence of a petition from Mr Robert Hunter now miniſter at Bornſtounneſs, ordered the ſtipend of the pariſh of Dunning, for the two laſt years which he ſerved in that pariſh, to be paid him, and that letters of horning be directed for that effect.

On the 20th of that month they ordered the chancellor for Fyfe, and duke Hamilton for the weſt country, to inquire what magiſtrates and counſellors for burghs had not ſigned the declaration; and, on the 7th of March, upon receiving a complaint that Mr Row, who had been tranſlated from Balmaclellan to the pariſh of Stony-kirk, was hindered from taking poſſeſſion of it, ordered the cauſe to be inquired into, but no proſecution followed: Row at this time turned papiſt.

As the 2d indulgence, of which I have given a pretty large account, was attended with no ſmall difficulties to thoſe miniſters who accepted of it, it involved the reſt of the ejected miniſters, who could not comply, in great diſtreſs: and ſome have thought it would have been a great happineſs if none had accepted it, but ſtrenuouſly adhered to the preſbyterian covenanted principles. There were many named who did not, and would not comply: Wherefore, on the 7th of March, the council, reſolving to force them to their confinements in thoſe pariſhes allotted for them, ordered all the outed miniſters to remove five miles from Edinburgh, unleſs they immediately gave bond not to keep conventicles. And, on the 12th, ſuch miniſters as had not entered on their confinements were called before the council. There appeared Meſſ. George Waugh, Robert Young, James Kirktoun, James Donaldſon, Robert Lockhart, Matthew MacKail, Patrick Anderſon, Alexander Barton, James Hamilton, and William Thomſon, and were appointed to repair to their reſpective pariſhes of confinement, by the 1ſt of June next, under the pain of being apprehended as deſpiſers of the king's authority. Orders were at the ſame time given to the king's forces, ſheriffs, and magiſtrates, to ſeize them wherever they could be found, if they did not obey this appointment. They generally thanked the council for the time allowed them, and promiſed to take the matter under ſerious conſideration. But when Mr Young came before them, he complained of his having been unjuſtly turned out of his charge by biſhop Sharp, and begged their lordſhips to conſider it. The biſhop roſe up, and alledged that he had been orderly and juſtly depoſed by him and the ſynod of Fife. Mr Young offered to prove, upon his peril, by the date of his ſentence, that he was depoſed before the ſynod met. Nevertheleſs the chancellor, without taking any notice of his complaint, told him it was the council's pleaſure he ſhould go to his confinement by the 1ſt of June. He anſwered, That he was ſorry that ſuch a ſentence was paſſed for no other reaſon than their pleaſure, and humbly proteſted that it might not prejudge him of reparation of the wrong done him by the biſhop, and that his obedience to the council's pleaſure ſhould not involve him in any approbation of the complex act of indulgence. Meſſ. Robert Maxwell, John Law, William Weir, James Walkinſhaw, Alexander Jamieſon, and James Wallace, were called, but, being abſent, the matter was delayed.

About this time a great turn of affairs happened in England, by which the meaſures of the cabal were diſconcerted, whoſe great project was, as has been related, to eſtabliſh popery, and render the king abſolute. But ſoon after the parliament met, the commons addreſſed the king to recal his declaration, ſince penal laws, in matters eccleſiaſtical, cannot be ſuſpended but by act of parliament; and, perceiving his majeſty not inclined to this, they ſtopt their money-bill. Whereupon the king, being in want of money, was eaſily perſuaded to give up his indulgence, contrary to the advice of the cabal: and accordingly, on the 8th of March, he called for the declaration, and broke the ſeal with his own hands. This pleaſed the commons, but diſguſted the cabal. Arlington had in ſome meaſure deſerted them before; but when Shaftſbury ſaw how unſteddy his majeſty was, he concluded he was not to be truſted; and ſo, from being the head of the cabal, he became the head of the country party. Immediately after this change in the earl of Shaftſbury, the commons paſſed the teſt act, intitled, An act for preventing the dangers which may happen from popiſh recuſants; which having received the royal aſſent, moſt of the Roman catholic officers quitted their places. The duke of York reſigned the office of lord high-admiral, and Clifford that of high treaſurer. Thus the cabal was divided. But the king adjourned the parliament to the 20th of October, and from thence to the 27th, in order to defeat ſeveral bills which were diſagreeable to him.

Had the managers in Scotland followed the example of the commons of England, inſtead of proſecuting their proteſtant brethren, at the inſtigation of a pack of impious prelates, religion would have flouriſhed, and a ſtop had been put to the growing progreſs of popery. It is true a clogged indulgence was granted, which many faithful miniſters could not in conſcience comply with. But then, to gratify the biſhops, a moſt rigorous proclamation was emitted againſt conventicles, requiring all heritors, liferenters, and wadſetters, to inform the council, or the ſheriff of the ſhire, ſteward of the ſtewartry, &c. of houſe or field conventicles kept within the bounds of their reſpective lands; and ſignifying, that, if they do not give ſuch information in three days after the conventicle is kept, they ſhall be fined in the fourth part of the yearly valued rent of their whole lands within the ſhire where the conventicle ſhall be kept; one third part of which was for the ſheriff, and the other for the informer, and the reſt for the king's uſe. Which furious proclamation occaſioned very terrible oppreſſions in many places.

Two days before this Mr Robert Gilleſpie was before the council, and owned he had kept one conventicle in the town of Falkland; but refuſing to inform againſt any preſent, was ordered to be ſent priſoner to the Baſs, where he continued till the beginning of next year, when he was let out for ſome time on account of his health.

On the 7th of May, a letter from the king, dated the 29th of April, was read in council, ſignifying that the ſtate, with whom he was at war, had a deſign to raiſe troubles in the weſt of Scotland, and therefore requiring them to ſuppreſs conventicles, and ſecure the weſt country. Upon this letters were wrote to duke Hamilton, and the earls of Eglintoun and Caſſils. But it is plain the king had not more loyal ſubjects than theſe who were now perſecuted, who complied with every thing becoming faithful ſubjects, ſo that there was not the leaſt ground for any inuendo's of this nature.

When the 29th of May came, the biſhops got another handle for oppreſſing the preſbyterian miniſters. None of the indulged obſerved this anniverſary. If indeed their week-days ſermons fell on that day, they preached as uſual, but without taking notice of that ſolemnity. And therefore, on the 12th of June, letters were by the council directed againſt them in the ſhires of Air, Lanerk, and Kirkcudbright.

The

The same day another letter, dated the 31st of May, came from his majesty to the council, approving of their conduct as to the indulged and requiring them to prosecute those who could not comply; and, for preserving peace and order within the diocese of Glasgow, to give a commission to duke Hamilton, the earls of Linlithgow, Dumfries, and Dundonald, and the president, or any two of them, to put in execution the laws and acts of council in relation to church affairs, and to inquire into what disorders have been, or may be committed within that diocese, and to call before them sheriffs, justices, &c. who have been or shall be negligent in executing the laws against conventicles, deserting the kirks, irregular baptisms and marriages, &c. When this letter was read in council, all the members were not pleased with it, especially with the commission they were ordered to give; so that it was the end of July before a return was made, which shall be related in its proper place.

Mean while the council, on the 19th of June, recommended to the lords of session to grant no suspensions upon sentences passed on account of church irregularities that so nothing might hinder their execution.

About the end of June, Mr Alexander Peden, late minister at New Glenluce in Galloway, a man of singular piety, zeal, and faithfulness, and of whom many remarkable things are related, was apprehended by major Cockburn, in the house of Hugh Ferguson of Knockdow in Carrick, who had obliged him to stay that night in his house. They were both carried prisoners to Edinburgh. On the 26th of June the council appointed the register and advocate to examine him; and upon their report he was sent to the Bass, where he continued to the year 1678. Mr Ferguson was fined in 1000 merks for harbouring and conversing with him, and the council ordered 50 l. sterling to be paid to Cockburn out of the fines, and 25 l. to be distributed at his pleasure among the soldiers under his command. Mr Patrick Simpson, the indulged minister at Kilmacolm, sent him and the other prisoners a charitable supply of money, for which Mr Peden afterwards thanked him.

About this time began the prosecution of the indulged ministers for not observing the 29th of May. On the 3d of July many of them appeared and owned they had not observed that day, and were not clear in their own minds to keep any anniversary holy days of human institution. While they were before the council, some of them were interrogated as to other things besides the anniversary, such as their baptizing children in the parishes of conformists without testimonials, and if they had observed the council's instructions which were sent them with their acts of indulgence; and when one of them answered, that he had not seen the instructions spoke of, he was told by the chancellor, that that had been a neglect, but they should all see them; and accordingly they were ordered to attend on the 8th for that purpose, and to receive their sentence for not observing the 29th of May.

Mean while the ministers had frequent meetings among themselves, to consult how to act when the instructions should be delivered to them. A paper was drawn up by way of testimony; but they not agreeing to subscribe it, Mr George Hutchison was appointed to speak, in the name of the rest, the sense of these impositions, in case they were intimated to them. But then some condemned their conduct in not fixing the time when Mr Hutchison should have delivered their sentiments, that being left to his own prudence; for they thought he should have delivered his own, and the sentiments of his brethren whenever the council's instructions were proposed to be presented. Others again thought it was time enough when Mr Hutchison himself should be called for. However, as the instructions related to them all, and as a testimony was judged proper against every unlawful encroachment upon the exercise of their ministry, I leave it to the reader to judge whether this should not have been delivered before any one of their number had received them. But to come to matters of fact.

On the 8th of July the following ministers appeared before the council, viz. Mess. Anthony Murray, John Hamilton, John Oliphant, James Curry, John Lauder, John Stirling, James Hutcheson, John Eccles, Andrew Dalrymple, John Gemble, Hugh Campbell, Alexander Blair, James Veitch, John Hutcheson, Robert Millar, George Ramsay, John Bell, Ralph Roger, William Tullidaf, George Hutchison, John Spalding, John Wallace, and William Maitland, and were fined in the half of their stipend for the crop and year 1673, except the three last, who preached on that day. And Mess. John Crawford, John Baird, and William Fullerton, not appearing were denounced rebels.

This being done, the lords, on the same day, ordered the instructions to be delivered openly to the ministers present, that none might pretend ignorance. A list of them was drawn up, and every one was called in order of the list, and asked if he had a copy of his instructions; if he had he was dismissed, but if not the clerk delivered him a copy. It happened that Mr Hutchison's name was towards the end of the list; and he not offering to speak till his name should be called, some began to question whether he would speak at all, and therefore resolved to speak for themselves.

Accordingly, when the clerk delivered the paper to Mr Alexander Blair minister at Galstoun, he being moved with zeal, and remembering whose ambassador he was, told the council plainly, that he could receive no instructions from them to regulate him in the exercise of his ministry, otherwise he should not be Christ's ambassador but theirs; and then he let their instructions drop out of his hand, knowing no other salvo or manner of testifying for the truth. This plain dealing so exasperated them, that they immediately ordered him to be committed to prison, where he continued till near the end of the year, when, by reason of his sickness, he was let out, upon finding security in the sum of 5000 merks that he should re-enter in a month's time; but his indisposition continuing, his liberty was lengthened for another fortnight, and before that expired his glorious Master sent and rescued him from the rage of his persecutors, and the reproaches of his deserting brethren; and the sound of, Well done, good and faithful servant, filling his ears, made him shut his eyes singing, and give up the ghost with joy, and in full assurance of faith.

Sundry of his brethren looked upon his testimony as unseasonable; but whether it had not been better for them all to have unanimously joined him in the same open and free declaration, must be left with the reader. When Mr Hutchison was called, he discoursed concerning the difference between the civil and church-government, and their different powers formal and objective, intrinsic and extrinsic, and endeavoured to qualify what Mr Blair had said. But it is plain that they who could not comply with the indulgence never questioned the magistrate's lawful authority. After Mr Blair was imprisoned, Mr Hutchison and some others went to the chancellor, and other counsellors, and spoke to the same purpose with him, and begged favour for him; but that was not granted; for the chancellor told them, it was not the matter, but the manner of his speaking that had irritated them.

On the 10th of July, Mess. John MacMichan of Dalray, John Semple at Carsphairn, and John Cent of Kells, were fined for not observing the anniversary.

On the 25th the commission to the five persons mentioned in the king's letter of the 31st of May was agreed upon, and the council at the same time wrote to his majesty, signifying that they had granted the commission appointed; but humbly proposed that his majesty would consider, whether the right settling the affairs of the church and public peace in the diocese of Glasgow—be proper to be left in the hands of so few. It was some time before they had a return.

Mean while, on the 31st, they fined Mess. John Scot at Oxnam, James Fletcher at Newthery, and Robert Mowat at Herriot, as above, for not keeping the 29th of May. The same day Mr Alexander Wedderburn was committed to prison, because he confessed that he had preached and prayed in his own house, several being present besides his own family, till he either found security under 5000 merks, not to keep another conventicle, or take upon him a voluntary banishment. However, in about a month's time, they ordered him to be confined to the town of Kilmarnock.

And

And on the ſaid 31ſt of July they ordered a party of the guards to bring in Mr William Weir, the indulged miniſter of Weſt Calder, priſoner to the tolbooth of Edinburgh, becauſe, for ſatisfying his conſcience, he received a call from ſome of the heritors and people. In his firſt ſermon he declared his adherence to the Solemn League and Covenant, and did not acknowledge the power either of king or biſhop in matters belonging to the church of Chriſt. In ſhort, he preached againſt the ſupremacy, prelacy, and anniverſary holy-days of human appointment. This plainly ſhewed, that the council, by their act of indulgence, aimed, among other things, at the eſtabliſhment of the ſupremacy and prelacy; ſo, that the very ſpeaking againſt theſe things was judged criminal. How far then they who kept ſilence are to be juſtified, I leave with the reader. Mr Weir ſoon after this went to Ireland, where he continued till 1687, when he was called to his former charge at Linlithgow, where he remained till his death in July 1695.

The gentlemen formerly mentioned, as Kerſland, Blaikat, Quarreltoun, Bedlane, and others impriſoned for nonconformity, were this year continued in their priſons. But the ſeverity againſt Sir Andrew Kennedy of Clawburn, after the revolution lord-conſervator, in the Low Countries, is not to be omitted; for, on the 20th of Auguſt, he was, by a ſentence of the juſticiary, denounced a rebel, ordained to be put to the horn, and his moveable goods confiſcated for his majeſty's uſe. The ſentence bears, that Mr Robert MacWard late miniſter at Glaſgow, Mr Robert Trail at Edinburgh, Mr John Livingſton at Ancram, Mr John Brown at Wamphray, and others, having retired to Holland, had contrived moſt treaſonable deſigns againſt his majeſty's perſon and government, and for involving their country in the calamities of a civil war; and, in order to this, had compoſed ſundry ſeditious books and pamphlets, as Naphtali, Jus populi vindicatum, &c. and ſent them to be diſperſed through the country, to confirm thoſe of their own principles, and to ſeduce others; that they ſtirred up the ſtates to make war againſt the king; and ſent home, or endeavoured to ſend home, arms, &c. had kept correſpondence with diſloyal and ſeditious perſons, among whom the ſaid Mr Andrew Kennedy was employed; that he had received and diſperſed the ſaid books, &c. kept correſpondence with them, and otherwiſe promoted their deſigns, and ſo was acceſſary to the crimes of treaſon, and was in abſence ſentenced as above. The reader is here to obſerve, that this ſentence was grounded on notorious falſehoods; for the miniſters above mentioned never ſtirred up the ſtates to war, nor promiſed the leaſt aſſiſtance in Scotland. And though ſome of them were the authors of the books mentioned, yet the books ſpeak for themſelves; and what is ſaid concerning Mr Kennedy's diſperſing thoſe books is abſolutely falſe.

Many were the exorbitant fines that were impoſed upon gentlemen in the ſhires of Dumbarton, Lanerk, Ayr, Galloway, Dumfries, and Renfrew. To give the reader a ſpecimen of the oppreſſions of ſome of the king's beſt ſubjects, merely for non-conformity, I ſhall in this place ſubjoin an account of the fines impoſed on ſome gentlemen in the ſhire of Renfrew alone. Thus,

A monſtrous ſum to be impoſed upon eleven perſons in one ſhire; and, had the whole been levied, the gentlemen muſt have been ruined. There was a compoſition made, and they were greatly haraſſed till it was exactly paid. My author could not give the date when theſe fines were laid on; but, as this was the third year ſince they were enacted by the parliament, he inſerts them in this place. And, as the facts are certain, the impartial reader cannot, I am perſuaded, think of ſuch a government without abhorrence.

Theſe hardſhips and ſeverities opened the eyes of ſeveral miniſters who had conformed to prelacy, to ſee the evil of their way. We related the conduct of the two excellent brothers, Meſſ. Alexander and John Carmichael. This year the Rev. Mr Thomas Foreſter miniſter at Alva, and after the revolution profeſſor of divinity at St Andrews, having had, for ſome time, ſeveral difficulties in his own mind concerning conformity abandoned prelacy. He had ever ſince the beginning of this year deſerted their meetings; and therefore, on the 7th of Auguſt, the clerk of the preſbytery of Stirling, by their order, ſent him a letter, finding fault for his non attendance, and ordering him to attend at their next meeting on the 26th. To which Mr Foreſter, in a letter, gave in his reaſons why he could not attend; as, '1. Becauſe it was evident, by then ſtanding acts relating to religion and church-government, that all power or juriſdiction in the church, or its aſſemblies, was fountained in, derived from, or ultimately referrable into the magiſtrate's civil power, which, ſays he, I judge to be contrary to the word of God, the confeſſions of reformed churches, and our own church's judgment; conſequently, the keeping of the meetings, a badge of the acknowlegement of the lawfulneſs of this frame, to be unlawful, this frame of church-government being clearly proved unlawful by ſuch as have written againſt eraſtianiſm. 2. Becauſe I find, ſince our firſt reformation, ſeveral oaths, vows, and ſolemn engagements upon this church and nation, againſt the prelatic frame of government, the obligation whereof I could never find convincingly diſproved, but, upon ſome ſearch, am perſuaded, that the ſame are ſtill binding on the nations and poſterity. 3. Upon ſome ſearch into the controverſy of church-government, I have, for a conſiderable time, entertained the perſuaſion of the unlawfulneſs of the prelatic frame, as contrary to the preſcriptions ſet down in the word. If theſe foundations hold, the unlawfulneſs of the meetings cannot be queſtioned, and, ſo long as I am thus perſuaded, I cannot attend upon them in faith.'

Theſe reaſons he enlarged, illuſtrated, and abundantly confirmed in a long paper, which he ſent to the brethren of the exerciſe, which the reader will find in Wodrow's appendix to book II. No. 66. which I cannot inſert in this place. Mr Foreſter was upon this obliged to quit his charge at Alva. Then he joined the perſecuted preſbyterians, and preached, or, according to the dialect of theſe times, kept conventicles, as he had occaſion, which brought upon him the rage of the perſecutors, as ſhall be related in the courſe of the following year.

On the 3d of September the council had a letter from his majeſty, wherein he complains that the outed miniſters had not been cited in the terms of his letter of the 31ſt of May; and tells them, that the power of the five propoſed was not at all privative of the council's power. In ſhort, in the cloſe, the commiſſion was dropt, and the council warned to take ſpecial care of the dioceſe of Glaſgow. Several were pleaſed with this, and immediately all the ejected miniſters in and about Edinburgh were called to hear their ſentence to repair to the pariſhes of their confinement; and power was given to the chancellor and earl of Athol to authoriſe whom they pleaſed to apprehend all who had been at field-conventicles, and either ſend them to Edinburgh, or oblige them to find ſecurity for their appearance.

Next day thoſe ejected miniſters, who had no particular pariſh aſſigned, were ordered to repair to ſuch pariſhes as ſhould be named by the council. Accordingly Mr John Park was ordered to confine himſelf to the pariſh of Kilmawers, Mr John Knox at Weſt-Calder, Meſſrs.

Messrs Robert Fleeming, Thomas Hogg, John Lidderdale and Alexander Hutchison, not appearing, were ordered to be apprehended where-ever they should be found. And on the 30th of September sentence was passed against all the ejected ministers who had not accepted the indulgence, except two or three who made some excuse and they were ordered to be denounced on the 6th of November; this was the case particularly with Messrs William Moin, James Donaldson, and William Creighton. But Messrs James Kirkton, Robert Lockhart, John Waugh and Thomas Melvil were excused.

But the ministers who continued in the country, and could not comply with the council's orders, were brought to no small difficulties. About eight of them met together, and drew up the reasons of their non compliance among whom was the Rev. Mr John Burnet, minister at Kilbryde near Glasgow, who, being summoned before the council, could not appear on account of his bodily indisposition. Nevertheless he thought it his duty to give an open and plain account of his reasons to the council, and therefore drew them up in writing to be presented; but though his sickness, of which he died about the end of this year, prevented this, yet he sent the paper to the chancellor without altering its form or style. As he left it as his testimony, it is fully recorded in the history of indulgence, from whence I give the following large abstract thereof.

BEING called before his majesty's privy council, to give an account of the reasons why I have not accepted of this present indulgence—I shall premise these things briefly. 1. That it is well known,—that the constitution and government of this—church of Scotland, for many years, and particularly in the year 1660, was framed according to the word of God, confirmed by many—laws of the kingdom, and solemnly sworn to by all ranks within the same. 2. It is also found—that this ancient and apostolic government is wholly overturned in its very species and kind—by the introduction of lordly prelacy—3. The sad effects of these things are conspicuously apparent on the face of the church this day, such as involving the land in great backsliding and defection; the abounding ignorance and atheism,—the increase of popery and error.—the sharp sufferings of many of his majesty's loyal subjects, &c. 4. Whatever power sound—divines acknowledge the magistrate to have,—in a troubled and extraordinary state of the church, yet it is not yielded—that he may any ways alter its warrantably established government, and so turn that same troubled and perplexed state of the church, made so by himself, to be the subject of his magisterial authoritative care and operation. 5. That if I be not mistaken, as denying to his majesty his just power in ecclesiastic matters, I,—with great alacrity, acknowledge that the civil magistrate hath a power circa sacra. which power is objectively ecclesiastic, so as he, by his royal authority, may enjoin, that whatsoever is commanded by the God of heaven may be diligently done for the house of the God of heaven: which power also is by God's appointment only cumulative and auxiliary to the church, not privative nor destructive, and is to be exercised always in a civil manner. As to the reasons of my not acceptance—they are,

I. That our Lord Jesus Christ, Mediator, the king and lawgiver of his own church, hath committed all ministerial authority, for government of his house, to his own church officers, as the first proper subject and receptacle of it. John xx. 21. Matth. xxviii. 18 19. 20. 2 Cor. x 8. But—the act explanatory of his majesty's supremacy in the church (whereupon the act of indulgence is grounded) doth not only claim the power to belong of right to his majesty and his successors, as an inherent privilege of the crown, but doth actually also invest him with the formal exercise thereof in his own person, and that—he may convey it to others, as in his royal wisdom he shall think fit; for his majesty is pleased to design and make application of ministers to congregations. and that without the previous call of the people and power of the presbytery;—to frame and prescribe ecclesiastical rules relating to the exercise of the ministerial office, and appoint a commission to plant and transplant ministers as they shall think fit, notwithstanding it hath been unanswerably evinced, that presbyterian government is founded on the word of God, and confirmed otherways abundantly.

II. Although I freely—condemn all—seditious meetings, (among whom it is said—that the peaceable meetings of the Lord's people for worship—should be reckoned) yet I am so convinced—of the Lord's blessing attending the preaching of the gospel, though not in a parish church that I judge the narrative of the first act to go near to involve my acceptance of this indulgence, as being an interpretative condemning of the said meetings.

III. There is a standing relation between me and another flock, over which I was set by the appointment of Jesus Christ in his word, which tie can never really be dissolved by any other power than that which at first did make it up, and gave it a being. And after I had ten years during the English usurpation, wrestled in opposition to Quakers and independents,—I was, without any ecclesiastic sentence, thrust from the public exercise of my ministry in that place where there will be 1200 examinable persons, of which there were never 50, to this day, who have seceded themselves to him who is called the regular incumbent—Now what a door is hereby opened to error, atheism and profaneness?—and what a grief must it be to those to have their own lawful pastor thus up in a corner?—or how can any new relation subsist between another flock and me, by virtue of an act of a mere civil judicature? Besides, the people in whom I have present interest, are utterly rendered hopeless by a clause in the end of the first act, That the indulgence is not hereafter to be extended to any other congregation than those mentioned in the act, whereof, they in that parish are none.

IV. Though I will not—debate the magistrate's sentence of confinement, yet—there are so many things attending the application of it to my person, that it cannot be expected I should give that obedience to it which might infer my own consent or approbation; for 1. This confinement—is a very sharp punishment as it is circumstantiated. 2. All punishments—ought to relate to some cause or crime, and cannot be done arbitrarily without oppression, Acts xxv. 27.—yet I am sentenced and sent to Letters to a congregation, without so much as being charged with any crime. 3. If my confinement relate not to any crime, it must needs relate to a design, viz. that I should preach, &c. wholly at the appointment and disposal of the civil magistrate.—Now this design, however closely covered, I dare not in conscience, yea, I cannot (with the preservation of my—principles) concur with, or consent thereto. 4. By the confinement I am put to an open shame before the world, and particularly in that place where I am permitted to preach the gospel; for what weight can my preaching or ministerial acts of discipline and government have, while I my self am—dealt with as a malefactor and transgressor, a rebel or traitor to my prince and nation? or how can I preach against the sins of the times,—while the sword of the magistrate is continually at my throat?—5. This confinement is not simply or mainly of my person—but it is of the office itself—while it is not of me alone, but of all the presbyterian ministers in Scotland, a very few only excepted; and, while the propagation of the gospel is hereby manifestly obstructed, we are cut off from the discharge of many necessary duties we owe to the church and nation,—while she is in hazard to be swallowed up with a swarm of Jesuits, Quakers, &c. and while three parts of the kingdom are groaning under the want of the word faithfully, preached, and some few shires in the west are made, as it were, the common jail of all the ministers that are permitted to preach. By this confinement I lose an essential part of my ministry, which is the exercise of jurisdiction and church government—a principal part of which is ordination, for preserving a succession of faithful men in the church.

V As for the permission I have to preach when confined while I look on it abstractly, it is a very great favour, but take it without the previous call of the people, the authority and assistance of a presbytery, and without the exercise of discipline and government—it is lame. Again, take it with the confinement and other clogs and circumstances contained in the 2d act, &c.—I have it to consider, whether ther this my permiſſion be not putting my neck under a heavier yoke, than—before.

VI. The laſt reaſon, for brevity, is from the dependence this act—of indulgence hath upon the late explanatory act of his majeſty's ſupremacy, when——the eſtates of parliament——declare, that his majeſty hath the ſupreme authority and ſupremacy over all perſons, and in all cauſes eccleſiaſtic within this kingdom; that, by virtue thereof, the ordering and diſpoſal of the external government of the church doth properly belong to his majeſty and his ſucceſſors, as an inherent right to the crown; and that his majeſty and ſucceſſors may ſettle—ſuch conſtitutions, &c. concerning the external government of the church, and the perſons employed in it, and concerning all eccleſiaſtical meetings and matters—as they, in their royal wiſdom, ſhall think fit. Again,—the particulars of the act of indulgence are of the ſame nature and kind with the articles explanatory of his majeſty's ſupremacy, viz. to ſettle, enact, emit, acts and orders, concerning matters, meetings and perſons eccleſiaſtic, according to their royal pleaſure—The rules and inſtructions, for limiting miniſters in the exercife of their office,—are ſuch as I declare I cannot accept of them, or any other favour whatever, upon ſuch terms and conditions; becauſe they contain the down-right exercife of eraſtianiſm.—

He concludes with an earneſt deſire that God would put it in the king's heart to grant miniſters liberty to make full proof of their miniſtry, that they might have an opportunity to ſhew that the government which Chriſt has appointed, doth well conſiſt with the magiſtrate's civil government in the ſtate; and that preſbyterian miniſters may have acceſs to his majeſty for repreſenting juſt grievances.

The eight miniſters drew up their reaſons why they could not comply with the council's orders, but their paper was never preſented; and as it is to the ſame purpoſe with Mr Burnet's, I ſhall not inſert it here. It was ſubſcribed by Meſſrs Hugh Smith, John Buroet, Robert Fleeming, John Blackadder, David Hume, Alexander Jamieſon, George Campbell and Donald Cargill. Mr Burnet was a miniſter of great ſolidity and learning, and ſingularly uſeful in reclaiming Quakers in that neighbourhood. And, ſays my author, though he had no freedom to fall in with the indulgence himſelf, yet he both heard ſome of the indulged miniſters, and preſſed his people to do ſo likeways. He died in great peace and full aſſurance 22d of December this year.

We have hinted a little concerning the proceedings of the Engliſh parliament, which had been adjourned to the 27th of October. On the 31ſt the commons went in a body, and preſented a dutiful addreſs againſt the duke of York's marriage with the princeſs of Modena. But not receiving any ſatisfying anſwer, they proceeded farther, and voted the ſtanding army a grievance, and prepared an addreſs accordingly. But on the 4th of November, when the commons were to preſent it, the king came unexpectedly to the houſe of peers and ſent for them. It happened that the ſpeaker and the uſher of the black-rod met both at the door of the houſe; but, as the ſpeaker was within, the door was immediately ſhut againſt the uſher. The ſpeaker was forced into the chair; and while the uſher continued knocking, the houſe voted, 1. That the alliance with France was a grievance. 2. That the evil councellors about the king were a grievance. And 3. That the duke of Lauderdale was a grievance, and not fit to be truſted or employed in any office or place of truſt. Upon which there was a general cry, To the queſtion, to the queſtion! but the black rod continuing knocking, the ſpeaker leaped out of the chair, and roſe in great confuſion. When the commons went to the houſe of lords, the king prorogued the parliament to the 7th of January, during which prorogation the duke of York's marriage was conſummated on the 21ſt of November.

The duke of Lauderdale, being thus voted a grievance by the commons of England, made the beſt of his way to Scotland, where in the month of December, he held his fourth ſeſſion of parliament. When the parliament was opened the king's letter was read, deſiring their aſſiſtance in carrying on the war with Holland, and aſſuring them of his affection in very kind words; and likeways told them, 'That one of the principal reaſons of keeping this ſeſſion of parliament is, that effectual courſes may be laid down for ſettling and curbing the inſolent field-conventicles and other ſeditious practices,—and that if fairneſs will not do, force muſt compel the refractory to be peaceable and obey the law.' The duke ſeconded the letter with a ſpeech to the ſame purpoſe; but providence interpoſed, ſo that no new laws were made in this ſeſſion againſt the preſbyterians; for the duke ſoon found that a ſtrong party was formed againſt him; for when it was moved 'that a committee be appointed to draw up an anſwer to his majeſty's letter, duke Hamilton moved that the ſtate of the nation might firſt be conſidered, in order to the redreſs of grievances, ſome of whom he mentioned. And then, according to concert, about twenty members, one after another, ſpoke to ſeveral particulars. Some mentioned the ſalt, others the tobacco and brandy; ſome complained of the adminiſtration of juſtice, and others of the coin.' In ſhort, warm debates aroſe. And when the commiſſioner appeared with ſome briſkneſs for a ſupply to his majeſty, one of the members aſked, Whether this was a free parliament or not? Sir Patrick Hume of Polwart, and ſeveral other gentlemen, ſpoke with great freedom and plainneſs. So that now Lauderdale had the mortification to find himſelf voted a grievance by the commons of England, and his meaſures oppoſed in Scotland, and therefore he had no other ſhift but to adjourn the parliament.

About this time a breach happened between Lauderdale and Dr Burnet, afterwards biſhop of Sarum, the effect of which was, that the doctor in the year 1675, turned informer againſt the duke in the houſe of commons. But I now go on to

CHAP. X.

Of the ſtate and ſufferings of the Preſbyterians during the years 1674 and 1675.

THE managers in Scotland ſtill perſiſted in proſecuting the non-conformiſts, ſo that many of them were forced to wander from place to place to avoid the fury of their oppreſſors. Lauderdale ſtood his ground notwithſtanding all the attempts made againſt him. But I ſhall relate the tranſactions, as near as poſſible, in the order of time wherein they happened.

On the 8th of January Mr Matthew Mackail, miniſter at Bothwell, was let out of priſon, where he had been for ſome time, but refuſing to engage not to preach, was confined to the pariſh of Carluke, and a bond was given for his appearance when called. He had preached to upwards of 1000 people in the fields, in the year 1669, from Iſa. xxxii. 5. but though that ſermon made great noiſe, yet it does not appear he was troubled for it.

On the 25th of January the parliament was farther prorogued to March. The biſhops had conceived great hopes of accompliſhing their deſigns at this parliament, and for this end many things were collected as grievances to be laid before the houſe, particularly in a paper drawn up by the ſynod of Glaſgow in October laſt, viz. 1. That conventicles ſtill abounded more publicly and avowedly than ever, and that by ſome who never entered upon trials before any church judicatory, which, by the way, was falſe; for Meſſrs Maxwell, Crawford, Wodrow, Corbet, and others mentioned, were examined and licenſed by presbyterian miniſters, according to the acts of general aſſemblies. 2. That the indulged miniſters did not obſerve the council's rules. 3. That meeting houſes were erected. 4. That in one of them, at Kilſyth, the preacher curſed the king, his council, and all the royal family; but, had that been true, it is ſurpriſing the preacher was not laid hold on, the managers not being accuſtomed to let ſuch affronts ſlip through their fingers. 5. That the tutors of noblemen and gentlemens ſons were ill principled, and poiſoned their pupils. 6. That conventicles and indulged miniſters preached ſedition.——14. The 29th of May not obſerved. 15. Several horrid crimes were, ſay they, committed at conventicles, as inceſt, beſtiality, murder of children; beſides frequent adulteries, and other acts of wickedneſs. But this is altogether calumnious, and may put us in mind of the reproaches caſt upon the meetings of the primitive Chriſtians by their virulent rulent proſecutors. From ſuch innuendos as theſe, that vile pamphlet intitled, The ſpirit of popery ſpeaking out of the mouths of fanatical proteſtants, was publiſhed ſome years after this, but was ſufficiently anſwered, and the lies and forgeries contained in it abundantly detected by the Rev. Mr Matthew Crawford. The 16th and laſt grievance they mention was the increaſe of popery; but that gave them little uneaſineſs. As for ſome of theſe things, they were owned by the ſufferers, as practices upon which they did ſuffer, and what they judged conſonant to their principles. Whether theſe grievances were preſented I know not; but if they were laid before the commiſſioner and council, yet the proceedings at this time in Scotland, and the difference between the two dukes in England, prevented the gratification of the perſecuting clergy at this juncture.

As ſoon as the prorogation of the parliament was known, duke Hamilton and others went to court, to lay before the king the grievances of the nation. Religion was overlooked by both parties. And though the king blamed Hamilton for raiſing heats in the parliament, yet he diſmiſſed them with promiſes that it ſhould ſit in March, and all their grievances be conſidered. Accordingly they all haſted home; but, when they were met, Lauderdale produced a letter from his majeſty adjourning them till October.

Mean while, about the beginning of January, Mr James Mitchel was diſcovered, and apprehended by Sir William Sharp and two of his brother's ſervants, and was by the chancellor's order, made cloſe priſoner. On the 10th of February he was examined by the lord chancellor, lord regiſter, lord advocate, and lord Halton, and denied the aſſaſſination of the arch biſhop (but being taken apart by the chancellor, he confeſſed, having got aſſurance of his life) that it was he who ſhot the biſhop of Orkney while aiming at the archbiſhop. Lord Halton, in a letter to the earl of Kincardin, ſaid, That he thought his puniſhment would be the loſs of his hand, and perpetual impriſonment in the Biſs. On the 12th of February he was examined before the council, and ſaid nothing but what he had ſaid before the committee. He was then remitted to the juſtice court to receive his indictment and ſentence; to have his right hand cut off at the croſs of Edinburgh, and the forfeiture of his goods and poſterity, which laſt part was not to be executed till his majeſty be acquainted, becauſe, ſays lord Halton in a ſecond letter to Kincardin, aſſurance of life was given him upon his confeſſion.

On the 16th of February he wrote a large letter from priſon, to a friend, vindicating his practice, and owning the principles upon which he went.

But, while this affair was on the carpet, the rev. Mr Foreſter was apprehended by the magiſtrates of Stirling, for preaching in private families in that town; for which good ſervices the magiſtrates had a letter of thanks from the council, and had blanks ſent them that they might fill them up with names, and with the charges they were at, to bring in whom they pleaſed to Edinburgh, whither Mr Forreſter was carried under a guard, and where he continued till the indemnity in March, when he was ſet at liberty.

But to return to Mr Mitchel. On the 2d of March he was brought before the lords of juſticiary, and indicted for being concerned in Pentland, and for the attempt on the archbiſhop of St Andrews. But he pleaded not guilty, and inſiſted that the thing alledged againſt him ſhould be proved. The lords poſtponed the affair till the 25th.

Mean while the lords made an act, March 12th, in which it was ſpecified, that Mr James Mitchell 'confeſſed his firing the piſtol at the archbiſhop of St Andrews, upon aſſurance given him of his life, by one of the committee who had a warrant from the lord commiſſioner and ſecret council to give the ſame; and therefore did freely confeſs, &c.' In the ſaid act which Mr Wodrow has given at length, p. 37. it was declared, that, on account of his refuſing to adhere to his confeſſion, the promiſes made to him were void, and that the lords of juſticiary and jury ought to proceed againſt him without any regard to theſe.

The 19th ſeveral who were impriſoned at Edinburgh, for diſorders, church irregularities perhaps, were given by the council to captain James Hay to be recruits to a regiment he was concerned with in France.

About five days after this Lauderdale complimented the nation with an act of indemnity from the king. But though it was of little ſervice, on account of the many limitations and reſtrictions wherewith it abounded, yet the common people looked upon it both as a remiſſion for what was paſt, and a kind of ſecurity for the future in their following conventicles, which was the real cauſe of their taking more liberty at this time, and whereof Lauderdale when he went to court, laid all the blame upon duke Hamilton and his party, which occaſioned many letters to the council in order to ſuppreſs them.

Next day Mr Mitchel was brought before the juſticiary, but, as there was no proof againſt him, except his own confeſſion, they, with the conſent of the advocate, protracted the affair, and remanded him to priſon.

On the 26th of March Mr Forreſter, Thomas Lenox, and ſome others were ſet at liberty, poſſibly in conſequence of the indemnity. And the ſame day William Porterfield in Quarrelton got his confinement changed from Dunbarton to Paiſley, with liberty to walk abroad.

But though the ſtate had indemnified Mr Foreſter, yet the prelates and their underlings renewed their attacks upon him. And accordingly the diocеſan ſynod of Dunkeld paſſed a ſentence of depoſition againſt him on the 29th of April, which was confirmed by the biſhop on the 4th of May. The curious reader will find his judicious remarks on this ſentence, and on the biſhop's ratification, in Mr Wodrow's appendix, No. 56.

At this time the houſe of commons in England diſcovered a laudable zeal againſt popery and arbitrary power. The Engliſh parliament ſat down on the 7th of January and the lords preſented an addreſs, praying the king to iſſue out his royal proclamation, requiring all reputed papiſts to remove out of London and Weſtminſter during the ſeſſion of parliament. Next day both houſes joined in an addreſs for a general faſt, to implore God's bleſſing againſt the efforts of popery, &c. The commons likeways proceeded againſt the remaining members of the cabal, viz. Buckingham, Lauderdale and Arlington. It is ſufficient, for my purpoſe, to obſerve, that they unanimouſly voted that an addreſs ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, to remove the duke of Lauderdale from all his employments, and from his majeſty's preſence and councils for ever, being a perſon obnoxious and dangerous to the government. Theſe and ſuch like addreſſes were very diſagreeable to his majeſty, who could not be pleaſed to ſee every part of his conduct ſo ſtrictly examined: beſides he was obliged for want of the ſinews of war, to make peace with the Dutch, which he communicated to the parliament on the 11th of February. However, the commons ſtill proceeded on their grievances; but the king to defeat their deſigns, came to the houſe, and prorogued them to the 10th of November following, before any bill was ready for the royal aſſent.

Notwithſtanding all their proceedings, Lauderdale, diſregarding the vote of the commons of England went to court after the late prorogation of the parliament of Scotland; and though duke Hamilton followed and ſpoke freely to his majeſty concerning him, yet the king ſtill careſſed Lauderdale, inſomuch that, on the 19th of May, a proclamation was iſſued for diſſolving the parliament. The reaſon given was, the peace lately concluded with the Dutch; but the truth is, Lauderdale plainly perceived that he durſt not venture upon any more Scots parliaments.

About the end of May he got the privy council modelled to his mind, Tweddale, Queenſbury, Yeſter, Dumfries, Roxburgh, and ſome others, were turned out; and Kinghorn, Mar, Wigtoun, Roſs, Colingtoun, Craigy, and others, put in their places. Duke Hamilton himſelf was kept in, but, as he was never much in favour, he very ſeldom attended. And the king, to keep Lauderdale in credit in Scotland, after being diſgraced in England, ſent a very long letter to Scotland, approving of all Lauderdale's proceedings, ſo that he ſtill carried all before him.

The new-modelled council ſat down on the 4th of June when an accident happened which made no ſmall noiſe.

As men were not ſafe to give in any petitions to the council, a conſiderable number of women reſolved to appear for the perſecuted cauſe. Accordingly, when the counſellors came up, they found the parliament-cloſe almoſt filled with women. The archbiſhop ſtuck cloſe by the chancellor, being in no ſmall pannic at this female aſſembly. Some of the women called him Judas, and others traitor; and one of them laid her hand on his neck, and ſaid, Ere all was done, that neck behoved to pay for it. But no other violence was offered. The widow of the Rev. Mr John Livingſton preſented their petition to the chancellor, ſetting forth the ſad condition of the country in being deprived of their faithful miniſters, and praying that theſe might again have their liberty, without molleſtation, to exerciſe their miniſtry. The earl received the petition with civility, read it directly, and heard what ſhe had farther to offer. He talked a little with ſome of the reſt, jeſted with them, and ſeemed to be pleaſed with the fright that Sharp was put into. Notwithſtanding, when the counſellors got within doors, and found the petition ſigned, it was voted criminal. About a dozen of the ſubſcribers were called in, one by one, and declared that no man had any hand in what they did, but that they were moved with the ſenſe of their periſhing condition for want of the goſpel, having none to preach to them except ignorant and profane men, whom they could not hear. Then they were all put into a room by themſelves, and the provoſt was ſent to diſmiſs the reſt However, they reſolved not to withdraw till their friends were ſent out, and declared they would all take the ſame lot. Upon which the council were pleaſed to liberate the reſt, and ſo this tumult was ended.

Next council day the ſubſcribers were all called, and, upon their not appearing, were denounced rebels, except Mrs Margaret Johnſtoun, daughter of the excellent lord Wariſton, Mrs Cleland, and Lilias Campbell, who were apprehended and impriſoned. And about the end of the year Mrs Elizabeth Rutherford, Mrs Margaret Johnſton, lady Merſington, and ſeveral other women concerned in this affair, were, by the council, baniſhed the town of Edinburgh and the liberties thereof.

Before I come to relate the proceedings of the new council, it will be proper to give the reader a ſhort view of the conduct of the preſbyterian miniſters about this time. Both indulged and not indulged met frequently among themſelves, licenſed ſeveral promiſing young men, ſent them to preach in thoſe parts of the country where they were moſt wanted, excited vacant congregations to call them, and upon the peoples call, ordained them with all the ſolemnity the times would admit of.

In this month of June the preſbyterian miniſters, in every corner of the church, ſent delegates to Edinburgh to concert upon proper rules and overtures to be tranſmitted to the ſeveral meetings of miniſters through the country. Accordingly they met, and, among other things, agreed that the ſeveral meetings take care to ſend preachers where the neceſſities and deſires of the people required them, and to warn them faithfully of the evils and dangers of the time, &c. that it be provided, that no offers from the ſtate, relating to church-affairs, be rejected or accepted by any particular miniſter, without the previous knowlege of the ſeveral ſocieties; and that miniſters in this, as in other things, ſubject themſelves communi preſbyterorum conſilio: that neither miniſters nor probationers ſettle with a people without conſent of the meeting in the bounds, &c.

Together with theſe overtures the materials of an addreſs to the government were tranſmitted to the ſeveral aſſociations of miniſters, in which they juſtly complained of their hardſhips, of the change of the government of the church, of their not being allowed to acknowlege their allegiance to the ſovereign, according to the ſcriptures, unleſs they allow him to have that ſupremacy which does not belong to him, and ſo be found guilty of encroaching on the ſovereign authority of Jeſus Chriſt the only King and Head of his church;—that a great number of valuable young men are kept uſeleſs; and that little or no care is taken to ſtop the growth of popery; and therefore, prayed that their lordſhips would take theſe things under their moſt ſerious conſideration.

Theſe overtures and materials for an addreſs were ſent round the country, and generally conſented to, with ſome amendments and additions; but, as all their conſultations came to nothing, I ſhall not inſiſt upon them.

We have obſerved, that, from the act of indemnity above mentioned, people took encouragement to frequent conventicles ſo that about this time theſe pretty much abounded through the kingdom, which greatly diſguſted the prelates, and therefore they uſed their utmoſt endeavours to ſuppreſs them, eſpecially the field meetings, which produced ſeveral letters from the court in order to bear them down.

Accordingly, at the firſt meeting of the council, on the 4th of June, a letter from his majeſty to this purpoſe was read, wherein the council was required to uſe their utmoſt endeavours for trying and apprehending the preachers at field conventicles, invaders of pulpits, and the ringleading heritors at ſuch meetings; and to uſe the ſtanding forces and militia for that end, leaving the puniſhment of other tranſgreſſors to the ordinary magiſtrate according to law.

Upon this the council appointed a committee to take theſe things under their conſideration, and at the ſame time ordered the chancellor to ſend out parties to apprehend all conventicle-preachers; particularly Meſſ. John Welſh Gabriel Semple, Ro. Roſs, Samuel Arnot, Gabriel Cuningham, Archibald Riddel, John Moſman, John Blackadder, William Wiſheart, David Hume, John Dickſon, John Rae, Henry Forſyth, Thomas Hogg, Robert Law, George Johnſton, Thomas Foreſter, Frazer of Brae, John Law, Robert Gilleſpie. And any of the guards who ſhall apprehend Mr Welſh, or Mr Semple, were promiſed 4001. ſterling, and 1000 merks Scots for each of the reſt; nay, the ſoldiers and their aſſiſtants were indemnified of any ſlaughter committed in apprehending any of theſe perſons, in caſe of reſiſtance.

The eminent, faithful and laborious Mr Welſh had, at the deſire of many, made a journey through Fife, where he preached frequently, ſometimes in vacant churches. Sharp was an eye-witneſs to a numerous congregation at Wolmet-chapel. And Mr William Weir preached to a crouded aſſembly in Magdalen-chapel in Edinburgh; other miniſters likewiſe preached there, for which the town was fined in 1001. ſterling; but the meetings moſt taken notice of were thoſe by Meſſ. Johnſton and Kirkton in the church of Cramond.

Accordingly, on the 11th of June, the council paſſed a decree or judgment againſt the heritors of Cramond. And Mr John Inglis of Cramond appearing, and confeſſing he had been ſix times at the ſaid kirk when conventicles were held there, was fined in the fourth part of his valued rent, amounting to 10361. Scots, and appointed to ly in priſon till it was paid, and longer during the council's pleaſure; however, he was ſet at liberty when he paid his fine. The ſame day lord Balmerino and Sir John Young of Leny, denying that they had been at any of theſe conventicles, and taking the oath of allegiance, were diſmiſſed; as was likewiſe Mr Charles Oliphant of Langtoun-law, upon declaring that he went to one of theſe merely out of curioſity, and promiſing not to go any more, and taking the oath of allegiance. Thus the reader may ſee with what briſkneſs the new council went to work. And, the more effectually to ſuppreſs what they called unlawful and factitious meetings, they iſſued two proclamations on the 18th of June; the firſt was to oblige heritors for their tenants. In this all maſters of families were ordered to diſmiſs from their ſervice all who repaired to conventicles, and all heritors, &c. were ordered to require their tenants to ſubſcribe the following bond, viz.

'I N. N. bind and oblige me, that I, my wife, or any of my children in family with me, my cottars or ſervants, ſhall not keep or be preſent at any conventicles, either in houſes or in the fields, as the ſame are defined by the 5th act of the 2d ſeſſion of his majeſty's ſecond parliament, under the pains therein contained; being for ilk houſe conventicle twenty-five pounds Scots for each tenant labouring land, twelve pounds for each cottar, and for each ſervant-man a fourth part of his year's fee; and the huſbands the half of theſe fines for ſuch of their wives and children as ſhall be at any houſe-conventicle; and the double of the reſpective fines for each of the ſaid perſons that ſhall be at any field conventicle.' To which is ſubjoined a clauſe of regiſtration in common form.

In caſe tenants refuſed, they were to be put to the horn, and their eſcheat or forfeiture to be given to their maſters Beſides, heritors were ordered to oblige their tenants for the future, in their leaſes, or in ſeparate bonds, to engage to abſtain from conventicles. And an unlimited power was given to magiſtrates to charge all they ſuſpected to give ſecurity for their good behaviour, I ſhall leave the reader to make his own reflections on theſe unprecedented and unreaſonable impoſitions.

The other proclamation was for apprehending rebels and others, that is, the holders of and repairers to conventicles; for here it was declared, that whoſoever ſhould ſeize convocators to conventicles, or any who have been at them ſo as they may be convicted, ſhould have their fines, and, in caſe of contumacy, their eſcheats: and whoever ſhould apprehend any miniſter at conventicles ſhould have 1000 merks, and 2000 merks for Meſſ. Welſh, Semple and Arnot.

On the 25th of June they paſſed ſentence againſt keepers of conventicles in Fife, and the following perſons were fined, viz.

	L.
Sir John Kirkaldy of Grange — —	550
Laird of Reddie — — — —	850
Scot of Pitlochie — — — —	1000
Pitcairn of Pitlour — — — —	1050
Pitcairn of Lauriſtoun — — — —	200
Charles Cowan of Corſtoun — —	333
Robert Colvil in Balvaird — —	100
Robert Schaw in Auchtermuchty — —	49
James Hamilton of Innerdirot — —	150
— Maxwell provoſt of Auchtermuchty —	250
Mr George Herriot of Ramorney —	983
Making in all	5515

And becauſe the laird of Reddie harboured Mr Welſh, he was fined in 2000 merks more; and Pitlochie, for his alledged impertinent behaviour before the council, in 500 merks more; and all of them were ordered to lye in priſon till they paid their fines. There were 40 or 50 others ſummoned to appear at this time, who, not anſwering, were ordered to be denounced rebels. The ſame day another decreet was paſſed againſt the keepers of conventicles in ſeveral places; at ſome of which Mr John Pringle of Woodhend being preſent was fined in the fourth part of his yearly valued rent, and afterwards ſet at liberty upon paying 277 l. Scots; and ſundry of the meaner people were denounced for not appearing when ſummoned.

On the 30th of June the council received a letter from the king, dated at Windſor the 23d, wherein his majeſty lets them know what he had been informed of relating to the abounding of conventicles, the invading of pulpits, the petition of the women, the reſiſting of his forces (for which laſt there was no ground) and that, for putting an end to all theſe ſeditious diſorders, he had ordered divers troops of his proteſtant ſubjects in Ireland to be in readineſs at the ſea-ſide in Ulſter to receive his farther commands; and had alſo ordered troops to march to Berwick if there ſhould be occaſion. And in the mean time he required them to uſe their utmoſt vigour in finding out and bringing to puniſhment the ringleaders of the aforeſaid ſeditious and inſolent practices. &c.

On the 2d of July the council returned a very complaiſant anſwer to his majeſty's letter, and at the ſame time wrote to Lauderdale, giving him an account of all their proceedings, and ſent up the following propoſal: That ſince they found it difficult to get proof againſt the keepers and frequenters of conventicles, his majeſty's advocate ſhould have authority to order ſuch perſons as ſhall be informed againſt for being at field conventicles, to be ſummoned before the council to give their oaths thereupon, with certification that they ſhall be holden as confeſt, or reputed guilty, if they refuſe; and that an act of council be made, warranting the advocate to refer the libel or charge to the oath of the defendant, and to reſtrict the ſame to an arbitrary puniſhment.

Before an anſwer came from court, the council on the 9th of July, paſſed another decreet againſt above 50 perſons in Fife for being at conventicles. None of whom appeared except the lady Colvil, who, upon producing a certificate from the miniſter of the parith, and promiſing not to frequent conventicles, was diſmiſſed. All the others were denounced. Two days after this the town of Glaſgow was fined in 100 l. ſterling, for a conventicle kept by Mr Andrew Morton and Mr Donald Cargill. About the ſame time Mr Robert Law, who had for ſome time been a priſoner at Glaſgow, was ordered to be brought to Edinburgh for keeping of conventicles, and warrants were iſſued for apprehending Meſſ. John King, Joſeph Wallace and Andrew Barton.

On the 16th of July the council received a return from the king, approving of their overture, and requiring them to make an act in the terms of it, which was immediately done. The ſame day, — Livingſton of Greenyards, and — Farquharſon of Chilbrae were denounced for being at a conventicle at Torwood; and Robert Ged of Bathridge, and Sir John Kirkaldy younger of Glaim, were ſeverely fined. The following worthy perſons were at the ſame time declared rebels, and outlawed, for no other cauſe than preaching the goſpel where they could have opportunity, viz. Meſſ. Alexander Lenox, David Williamſon, Alexander Moncrief, John Rae, David Hume, Edward Jamiſon, James Fraſer of Brae, William Wiſhheart, Thomas Hog, Robert Gilleſpie, James Kirkton, John Weir, John MacKillgen, Nathanael Martin, Andrew Donaldſon, John Chryſtiſon, William Row, Thomas MacGill, Thomas Urquhart, Thomas Hogg, William Erſkine, James Donaldſon, Patrick Gilleſpie, John Gray, James Wedderburn, John Wardlaw, Thomas Douglas, George Campbell, Francis Irvine, James Wallace, Andrew Anderſon, John Munniman, George Hamilton, Andrew Mactonn, Donald Cargill, Alexander Parteun, James Wilſon, and Robert Maxwell's elder and younger. I would have the reader to obſerve here, that the mannders were ſo incorrect, that in this liſt of miniſters outlawed, ſome of them were dead, others were indulged by the council, and ſome had never offended ſince the king's indemnity, who were nevertheleſs expoſed to a ſuffering lot.

On the 21ſt of July Mr James Drummond, who had been a priſoner for ſome time in Edinburgh jail for preaching in families, was ſet at liberty. But on the 23d the council fined Hary Pitcairn of Lauriſton in 1200 l. Scots, —— Pitcairn of Pitlour in 200 merks, George Scot of Pitlochie, and Charles Cowan of Carſtoun, in 1000 l. each; all for harbouring Mr Welſh. At the ſame time the magiſtrates of Perth were appointed to apprehend Mr Alexander Moncrief, an ejected miniſter; and Archibald Douglas of Cliftonhall, and James Maxwell provoſt of Auchtermuchty, were fined for being at conventicles, the firſt in 381 l. and the other in 252 l.

On the 28th of the ſame month the council diſcharged Meſſ. Robert and John Laws and John King, priſoners in the tolbooth of Edinburgh, from keeping conventicles, under the penalty of being treated as ſeditious perſons, and obliged each of them to give a bond and ſurety for 5000 merks to appear when called; and the ſame day recommended to the biſhops to inquire what chaplains and ſchoolmaſters officiated in their reſpective dioceſes without their licenſe. And,

At the ſame ſederunt a great many letters were wrote to the royal burghs through the kingdom, enjoining them rigorouſly to execute the laws againſt conventicles: aſſuring them that, in caſe of failure, they would exact the fines from them without any abatement. And, as a farther evidence of their tyrannical diſpoſition, in regard 'the burghs in Scotland, who have by law a privilege of meeting once a year in a body to conſider of trade, and of by laws relating to it, had, in a convention held this year, agreed upon and ſent a petition to the king complaining of ſome late acts that hindered trade, for the repeal of which there was great need for a ſeſſion of parliament; and had therefore prayed, that, when the king ſent down a commiſſioner to hold a ſeſſion, he might be inſtructed in order to that repeal. This, though judged a lawful aſſembly by the lawyers, eſpecially, ſays biſhop Burnet, as they did not petition for a parliament, but only for inſtructions ſtructions to the ſeſſion, was condemned as ſeditious, and the promoters of it were fined and impriſoned.'

The ſame 28th of July a letter from the king, dated at Windſor the 16th, was read in council, declaring that he had wrote to the archbiſhop of St. Andrews, that it was his royal pleaſure the biſhop of Dumblain be tranſlated to the iſles; that the biſhop of Brechin be appointed to preach at the college kirk of Edinburgh; and that the biſhop of Edinburgh remove Mr Turner, Mr Robertſon and Mr Cant from the exerciſe of the miniſtry in Edinburgh, or any place in his dioceſe, without licence; and that Mr Hamilton be removed from Leith; and therefore his majeſty required the council to oblige the biſhop of Dumblain to repair to the iſles within two weeks; and that within ten days Mr Turner remove from Edinburgh to Glaſgow, Mr Robertſon to Auchterleſs in the dioceſe of Aberdeen, Mr Cant to Liberton, and Mr Hamilton to Cramond, till farther orders.

The reader will judge whether this was not the full exerciſe of the royal ſupremacy. Biſhops and miniſters were removed and confined without any proceſs or trial! But that he may have the occaſion of this proceeding, we relate,

That, in the months of May and June, ſome both of the inferior clergy and biſhops, began to complain openly, that the church was not governed in an eccleſiaſtical way, but in a moſt arbitrary manner; that Sharp acted as a pope, managing all church-affairs without conſulting with the other biſhops: and that, though there was a law for a national ſynod, yet, through his influence, none had been called. Sharp and his friends alledged that theſe complaints were groundleſs, and were only fomented by the country party, as it was called, in oppoſition to Lauderdale's adminiſtration. Be that as it will, their complaints, and the motion for a national ſynod, were conſented to by Mr Lamy biſhop of Brechin, and Mr Ramſay biſhop of Dumblain. But the former was prevailed with to come into Sharp's ſentiments, and leave the latter to manage the affair alone. Among the inferior clergy the miniſters named in the king's letter were the moſt active; for though their dioceſan, the biſhop of Edinburgh, was moſt averſe from a national ſynod, yet they and ſome others agreed to preſent a petition to him, praying his lordſhip to do his utmoſt to get his majeſty to call ſuch a ſynod for conſidering the diſorders in the church. When this petition was preſented I know not. However, it greatly frightened Sharp, and therefore he wrote a whining letter to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, letting forth, That the church was in danger; a remarkable word! and begging he would uſe his intereſt with his majeſty to prevent the thing deſired. Sharp likewiſe laid the matter before the council, who, on the 2d of July, appointed the archbiſhop of St. Andrews, the lord privy ſeal, the earls of Kincairdin and Dundonald, the preſident and advocate, to examine into the conduct of the four miniſters relating to this affair. How this committee proceeded, or what iſſue they came to, I know not; but accounts of thoſe things were tranſmitted to his majeſty, who wrote the letter as above. There was a meeting of the biſhops appointed at St. Andrews, and Dumblain was ordered to be preſent, but he declined it.

When the king's letter was read in council, the contents were inſtantly obeyed; and a macer was ſent to intimate the royal pleaſure to all mentioned in it. And the ſame day the biſhop of Dumblain preſented a petition to the council, which they tranſmitted to the primate, that the king might be acquainted with it. But, notwithſtanding all that paſſed, the biſhop of Dumblain, in his papers, ſtill ſubſcribed himſelf Dumblain, and took the firſt opportunity to go in perſon to court. We ſhall hear more of this matter in the tranſactions of the following year. I ſhall only obſerve, that it was very dangerous, in thoſe days, to propoſe any thing contrary to the inclinations of thoſe at the helm. But, leaving this matter, let us return to the proceedings againſt the preſbyterians.

The vacation was now at hand, and therefore, that there might be no interruption in proceeding againſt conventicles, the council, on the 30th of July, gave a commiſſion, in the king's name, to the lord chancellor, the earls of Mar, Kinghorn, Kelly, Weems, and Kincairdin, the treaſurer depute, and the laird of Ardroſs, or any three of them, to execute the law againſt conventicles, irregular baptiſms and marriages, in the ſhires of Fife and Kinroſs; as alſo to the chancellor, duke Hamilton, &c. for the bounds of Stirling, Perth, Lanerk, Dumbarton, Renfrew, and Ayr ſhires; and, laſtly, to the chancellor, earls of Caithneſs and Linlithgow, &c. for Edinburgh, Linlithgow, Haddington, Selkirk, Peebles, Berwick and Roxburgh ſhires; they alſo had particular inſtructions given them; and jointly with theſe the advocate was appointed to iſſue out warrants, to cite all perſons concerned before theſe commiſſioners, and to reſtrict the libel or indictment to an arbitrary puniſhment, that ſo they may hold the perſons not ſwearing againſt themſelves as confeſſed, or treat them as guilty. As none of the biſhops were in this commiſſion, the reader need not be ſurpriſed to hear nothing of their proceedings. Next day the council wrote to Lauderdale an account of what they had done ſince their laſt.

In the month of Auguſt the ſufferers had ſome receſs; but, when the council met, on the firſt of September they received a letter from the king commending their diligence againſt conventicles, and acquainting them that, for enabling them to maintain the laws and government, he reſolved to raiſe ſome more forces, and ordered them to raiſe 1000 foot and three troops of horſe. This increaſe of the ſtanding forces in time of peace was very proper for the ſupport of an arbitrary government, and tended to harraſs the ſufferers.

The ſame day the council gave warrant for apprehending Mungo Lockhart of Harwood, William Liſlone of Colunun eaſter, George Tennant and John Brown in Calder, for being at a conventicle in Calder muir, and reſiſting a party of the guards who were ſent to diſperſe them: and likewiſe ordained letters of horning, upon the decreets of ſheriffs, bailies of regalities, and other inferior magiſtrates, againſt perſons guilty of being at conventicles.

On the 29th the council had another letter from his majeſty, wherein he deſired them to uſe all diligence with reſpect to conventicles and other unlawful practices, eſpecially at or near Cardroſs; and told them he was informed that ſome of his guards had, by their order, apprehended one King, who was ſet at liberty upon bail to appear; and that the lord Cardroſs, in a peremptory manner, complained of that man's being taken, on account of his being his domeſtic; and therefore ordered them to require that lord to bring him back to priſon.

The ſame day Mr Alexander Burnet was, by a ſpecial order from the king, reſtored to the archiepiſcopal ſee of Glaſgow, which he had been obliged to reſign ſome years ago. It was then believed this reſtoration of the archbiſhop was the effect of groſs ſimony. The biſhop's daughter was married to the heir of the eſtate of Elphingſton, and had a very large annuity ſecured to her upon the eſtate. In a little ſhe was left a widow. The gentleman who ſucceeded to the lordſhip of Elphingſton made his addreſſes to lord Halton's daughter. My lord was unwilling to engage with an eſtate ſo conſiderably burdened with the biſhop's daughter's jointure. At laſt an expedient was found out: the young lady was prevailed with to renounce her jointure, and Halton found means to get the archbiſhop her father reſtored to his office and benefice. This made ſome ſay, the biſhop's money, who gave his daughter an equivalent, was taken, but that of Simon Magus was not.

Mr William Drummond of Cromlicks, ſome time a major general, was at the ſame time ordered to enter priſoner into Dumbarton caſtle. He was obnoxious to Lauderdale, who therefore moved that he might be ſecured. He was kept in cloſe confinement for near four months, and then was permitted to walk about a little in the day time, and return at night.

On the 1ſt of October lord Cardroſs appeared before the council, and was required to produce Mr John King againſt next November: he told them, that it was not in his power, ſince, by their orders, Mr King was taken from him, and, after he had been ſome time impriſoned, was ſet at liberty, ſince which time he had not been in his ſervice. Though Mr King eſcaped at this time, yet he afterwards fell a ſacrifice to the fury of his perſecutors. The ſame day they approved the conduct of their commiſſioners for conconventicles, and made a preſent to Hugh Stevenſon, one of their clerks, of 500 merks, the fine levied from Mr King's ſurety.

On the 2d of December the heritors and kirk ſeſſion of Fenwick aſſembled, and appointed Mr Muir of Rowallan younger, to take care to have the laws againſt curſing, ſwearing, and other acts of profaneneſs, put in execution. Next day the archbiſhop of Glaſgow was admitted a counſellor, and the reviving the ſeverities in the weſt country was much owing to him. The ſame day the council baniſhed Henry Angus and James Jeffray, from the ſhires they lived in, becauſe, when brought before the commiſſioners at Stirling for being at conventicles, they refuſed to ſwear againſt themſelves.

I ſhall finiſh what I have to relate for this year with the affair of the advocates, which gives us another inſtance of the arbitrary proceedings of this reign. I take it from biſhop Burnet: 'A cauſe being judged in the ſupreme court of ſeſſion, the party appealed to the parliament. This was looked on as a high contempt, done on deſign to make the parliament a court of judicature, that there might be a neceſſity of frequent parliaments. The judges therefore required all the lawyers to condemn this as contrary to law; which ſeveral refuſing to do, the king ſent down an order to put all from the bar who did not condemn appeals. And when that did not produce the effect deſired, they were, by proclamation, baniſhed Edinburgh, and 12 miles round it; and a new day aſſigned them for making their ſubmiſſion, which they were obliged to do. Now in what a ſituation muſt a nation be, when thoſe learned in the law dare not deliver their own ſentiments, is eaſy for the reader to imagine. The ſame hiſtorian tells us, That the government of the city of Edinburgh was not ſo compliant as was expected; ſo duke Lauderdale procured a letter from the king to turn out 12 of the chief of the town-council, and to declare them for ever incapable of public truſt.

Things were managed much in the ſame way during the year 1675, for notwithſtanding the many ſevere laws againſt preaching and hearing the goſpel in private houſes and the fields, theſe meetings, eſpecially in the fields, continued to be very numerous, the violence of the ſoldiers, and the multitude of the hearers, obliging them to it. And great was the ſucceſs that attended the miniſtry there, many being converted thereby. Nay, ſome miniſters who had conformed came, and after the forenoon's ſermon, offered to join them, actually profeſſing their ſorrow for joining in the courſes of defection at that time. In ſeveral places they changed their way, forſook their churches, and upon their candid acknowlegements were received both by the field preachers and their people. It is true, the ſeverity of the laws occaſioned that not many gentlemen of eſtates durſt venture to come to theſe; but their ladies, and not a few of good faſhion, attended daily. In ſhort, theſe meetings were ſo numerous, that the managers, not being able to reach them all, found it neceſſary to overlook what they could not help. The biſhops indeed violently puſhed proſecutions; and ſoldiers and ſpies were employed to ſearch them out, and apprehend the miniſters, and the moſt noted of their hearers, and to diſperſe them; which obliged many to come with arms for their own defence, and ſome ſcuffles enſued in ſeveral places: and therefore various methods were taken to diſcourage and ſuppreſs conventicles. But I ſhall relate the occurrences as they fell out in the order of time.

There was a meeting of preſbyterian miniſters at Glaſgow on the 20th of January for ſynodical correſpondence; at which they came to ſeveral reſolutions, and made ſundry propoſals too tedious to be here inſerted; eſpecially ſince the ſeverity of the times prevented them from taking effect.

The miniſters who had accepted the indulgence were brought under hardſhips on account of their not being paid their ſtipends; which obliged ſeveral of them in the month of January, to petition the council for warrants to receive them, which a good many of them obtained; but at length, upon ſome pretence or other, the prelates got an act of council on the ninth of March, 'ordering that no indulged miniſters get warrants for their ſtipends, without teſtificates from the ſheriff or magiſtrates in the bounds, that they have not kept conventicles ſince the 24th of March 1674.' But, ſays Mr Wodrow, this reſtriction did not affect many of them. However, ſome months after this ſeveral of them were brought to great inconveniencies, as we ſhall relate.

The ſame day the Rev. Mr John Greg was before the council for keeping a conventicle at Leith mills. He owned the charge, and was ſent priſoner to the Baſs, where not a few died. After he had been impriſoned there for the ſpace of eight months, his confinement was changed to the pariſh of Carſtairs in Lanerk-ſhire.

About this time letters came from court, dated the 27th of February, ordering Mr James Stuart ſon to Sir James Stuart late provoſt of Edinburgh, to be apprehended, with all his books and papers, and made cloſe priſoner in Edinburgh, and to be allowed no converſe with any either by word or writing. This gentleman was ſuppoſed to have publiſhed a pamphlet, intitled, An account of Scotland's grievances by reaſon of the duke of Lauderdale's miniſtry, humbly tendered to his ſacred majeſty. Which galled the party ſo much, that though none of them were able to confute the facts he mentioned, they were reſolved to take the ſevereſt courſe they could with him. Mr Stuart, knowing their deſigns, went out of the way. But his cabinets were ſealed up, by order of council, on the 10th of March, and a ſtrict ſearch was made for him through Edinburgh, which he eſcaped; and, during his retirement made ſuch a proficiency in ſtudy and piety, that he afterwards made a conſiderable figure, and diſcharged the office of king's advocate with great applauſe for many years after the revolution.

The prelates complaining of the increaſe of conventicles about Edinburgh, orders were given to Lord Roſs's troop to march in different parties and ſuppreſs them. On the 11th of March the town of Edinburgh was fined in 100 l. ſter. for conventicles alleged to be kept within their liberties. And next day four companies of foot and a troop of horſe were ordered to quarter in Glaſgow for the eaſier ſuppreſſing theſe meetings.

As the duke of Lauderdale had the chief management of affairs, it is proper that we take a view of what paſſed in the Engliſh parliament in relation to him. The parliament ſat down there in April, and the commons immediately fell upon Lauderdale; and thoſe who knew what had paſſed between him and Dr Burnet moved that the doctor ſhould be examined before a committee. I ſhall give this examination in the doctor's own words. 'I was, ſays he, brought before them. I told them how I had been commanded out of town.—I was next examined concerning his deſign of arming the Iriſh papiſts. I, ſaid he, as well as others, had heard him ſay, He wiſhed the preſbyterians in Scotland would rebel, that he might bring over the Iriſh papiſts to cut their throats. I was next examined concerning his deſign of bringing a Scotiſh army into England. I deſired to be excuſed as to what had paſſed in private diſcourſe, to which I was not bound to anſwer, unleſs it were high treaſon. They preſſed me long; and I would give them no other anſwer. So they all concluded that I knew great matters, and reported this eſpecially to the houſe. Upon this I was ſent for, and brought before the houſe. I ſtood upon it as I had done at the committee, that I was not bound to anſwer; that nothing had paſſed that was high treaſon; and as to all other things I did not think myſelf bound to diſcover them. I ſaid farther, I knew duke Lauderdale was apt to ſay things in a heat, which he did not intend to do. And ſince he had uſed myſelf ſo ill, I thought myſelf the more obliged not to ſay any thing that looked like revenge for what I had met with from him. I was brought four times to the bar. At laſt I was told by the houſe, though they had a right to examine into every thing that concerned the ſafety of the nation, as well as into matters of treaſon, and they looked on me as bound to ſatisfy them, otherwiſe they would make me feel the weight of their heavy diſpleaſure, as one that concealed what they thought was neceſſary to be known; upon this I yielded, and gave an account of the diſcourſe formerly mentioned.'

Mr Wodrow, in his appendix, book II. No. 47. ſays, That the houſe not being fully ſatisfied with his anſwer, he was again called in to explain himſelf; and being withdrawn, drawn, some heads of his testimony, to avoid mistakes. were drawn up in writing; and being again called, and the same read to him, and having amended it in some particulars at the bar of the house; the same is as follows, viz. That coming into England, out of Scotland, the first Saturday in September 1673, he went to visit the duke of Lauderdale in his lodgings at Whitehall, where the duke and he conversed of the affairs of England and Scotland, and particularly of the proceedings of parliament concerning the declaration for suspending the penal laws in matters ecclesiastical; and being afterwards asked, Whether if Scotland, being called to assist the king, they would assist him or not? He answered, he thought they would not; but the duke replied, he believed they would, and that his coming into England would bring a great many. That the duke asking him of the affairs of Scotland, he answered, The people of Scotland, that were at such a distance, could not imagine what to think of the king's speech and declaration: whereunto the duke replied, Hinc illæ lachrymæ! and that all had forsaken the king but himself and lord Clifford. This is much the same with what the bishop himself says of his conversation.—Upon this and other informations the parliament drew up a very warm address against Lauderdale, but to no purpose; for he continued firm in the king's favour, and in that of the duke of York; so that in Scotland every thing was managed as they saw proper.

'In the month of May, Henry lord Cardross being in Edinburgh, and having left his lady at home by herself, Sir Mungo Murray, accompanied with Walter Stewart, Henry Graham, George Murray, James Spotiswood, Andrew Hume, and others, went in a tumultuous manner to his house of Cardross in the night time, and, without producing any orders, frightened the lady, then big with child; and made her get out of her bed, broke open his lordship's closet where his papers lay; and having seized upon Mr John King his lordship's chaplain, and Mr Robert Langlands tutor to Cardross's brother, (the late colonel John Erskine of Carnock) carried them away. All this his lordship laid before the council in a respectful petition, wherein he represented clearly, that this outrage was illegal, and an encroachment upon the privileges of peers, by forcibly taking away his domestic servants at such an unseasonable time, though they had been accused of no crime, and obliging his lady, then big with child, to get out of her bed, &c. But such was the iniquity of the times, that, instead of paying any regard to this reasonable petition, they made use of it as a handle against him; for some country people, who had profited by Mr King's ministry, having rescued him from the soldiers, this was made a handle of for prosecuting lord Cardross, though he was then at Edinburgh, and so could be noways accessary to the rescue.

'In the beginning of June a paper war was commenced between the archbishop of St Andrews and the bishop of Dumblain, who had been translated from his bishopric to that of the isles, for declaring his sentiments in relation to a national synod. The two bishops were then at London; but as the matter of the controversy was personal, respecting their conduct to one another, I shall not trouble the reader with it. The bishop of Dumblain answered all the interrogatories put to him, by a meeting of the bishops at St Andrews, with great openness and candour.

'Mr King's rescue was soon known at court, so that, on the 12th of June, his majesty wrote to the council, complaining of this attempt upon his forces, and the rescue of Mr King; together with the increase of conventicles in Teviotdale and East-Lothian; that the indulged ministers kept irregular and disorderly communions, appointing fasts, &c. In consequence of this letter a committee was appointed to consider the contents of it. And on the 22d of June the advocate was ordered to form a libel against lord Cardross and others, on account of Mr King's rescue.

'And the better to suppress conventicles, the council, on the 13th of July, appointed garrisons in the following houses, consisting each of a company of foot and twelve horse, viz. at Bridgehouse in Linlithgowshire, at Cardross in Perthshire, at Glentirring in Stirlingshire, at Mearns in Renfrewshire, at Douchill in Kinrossshire, at Dean in Kilmarnock in the shire of Ayr, at Airdrie in Lanerkshire, at Newark in Selkirkshire, at Hunthill in Roxburghshire, at Blane in Berwickshire, in the laird of Riddel's house in Roxburghshire, and at the castle of Dumfries in the shire of Dumfries. The officers and soldiers were to be at the said places by the first of August. Burnet says, 'That two were the chief dwelling houses of two peers, the rest were the houses of gentlemen that had gone into the party against duke Lauderdale. And though these were houses of no strength, and not at all properly situated for suppressing of conventicles, yet they were taken; soldiers were put in them, and the countries about were required to furnish these small garrisons with all things necessary. This, says that historian, was against the express words of the law that had lately settled the militia.'

'On the 15th of July they wrote to Lauderdale, giving him a detail of their proceedings since the 24th of March 1674. They likewise appointed a solemn fast to be observed on account of a long and threatening drought, which had a melancholy prospect as to the fruits of the ground.

'The same day most of the indulged ministers, being represented as having acted contrary to their instructions, and against the law, Sir John Nisbet the advocate was ordered to have them summoned before the council. Accordingly Mr James Veitch at Mauchlin, Mr John Gemble at Symington, and Mr Hugh Campbell at Muir-kirk, for having married and baptized in other parishes, not administering the Lord's supper upon the same day, admitting persons of other parishes, without certificates from the ministers of them, ordaining several persons to the office of the ministry, without authority from the council, and taking upon them to appoint days of fasting and humiliation; for these heinous crimes were the above ministers solemnly charged to appear and answer. But though these and sundry others were summoned, yet it seems they did not appear. Mr Wodrow thinks that the matter was made up by lord Stair and other well-wishers, as nothing could be laid to their charge, but keeping fasts in their own parishes for the same reason that the council appointed one.

'Soon after this the lord Cardross, instead of having any redress for the outrage that was committed in his house, was most unjustly prosecuted: for, on the 5th of August, the affair of Mr King's rescue was before the council, and sentence was passed against this excellent nobleman for being concerned in that attempt, because some of his servants was there, and finding that his lady had been present at many conventicles. They therefore ordered his lordship to enter the castle of Edinburgh, and remain confined there during his majesty's pleasure, and fined him in 1000 l. sterling, and 1350 l. Scots more, because he did not oblige his tenants to give bond not to keep conventicles.

'Next day one John Sandilands was fined in 300 merks for being at a conventicle near Bathgate in the beginning of the year. Upon the payment of which, and giving bond for 1000 merks if ever he went more to those meetings, he was set at liberty.

'On the same day they took under consideration the garrisons appointed for the houses above mentioned, and passed an act enjoining the major-general to see that the officers be careful to hinder any disorders from being committed by any under them, and to keep good intelligence for preventing all disorderly meetings, and for apprehending the preachers at conventicles, or any ministers who by the council are declared fugitives, &c. One would think that the appointment of such garrisons in the time of peace was unprecedented, illegal, and subversive of the liberty of the subject, especially as this was enacted without any order from the court, or so much as acquainting the king till it was done; besides the charge of maintaining them was a great burden on the country. At length it appeared so illegal and unreasonable, that peaceable gentlemen and subjects should be quartered upon like enemies, that it was found fault with at court; and though the bishops defended it for some time, yet they were obliged to drop it. However, the country groaned under this grievance more or less for several years.

'This same day the acts against conventicles were lengthened out for three years longer, and a new commiſſion was given to the earls of Winton, Linlithgow and Wigton, lord Balmerino, &c. for ſuppreſſing them and other church irregularities.

At the ſame time the council gave out letters of intercommuning againſt the following miniſters, gentlemen, ladies, and others, whoſe names I here inſert from the letters themſelves, viz. Meſſ. David Williamſon, Alexander Moncrief, William Wilheart, Thomas Hogg, George Johnſton, Robert Gilleſpie, John MacGilligen, John Roſs, Thomas Hogg, William Erſkine, James Donaldſon, Andrew Anderſon, Andrew Mortoun, Donald Cargil, Robert Maxwells elder and younger, and James Fraſer of Brae, Sir John Kirkcaldy of Grange elder,—Hamilton of Kinkell, James his brother, John Geddy in Falkland, John Arnots of Pitgrunzies, elder and younger, Archibald Arnot in Newburgh, Mr Thomas Arnot in Colleſſy, Andrew Arnot merchant in Kirkcaldy, Thomas Shaw elder of Goſpitrie, his ſon David, Henry Schaw in Balgony, George Fleming in Balbuthie, William Sethrum in Lundimill, John Miller in Dirnock, Andrew Kinnier merchant in St Andrews, John Thomſon in Fawfield, —— Govan in Crail, Robert Henderſon in Tarbet, —— Douglas portioner in Colleſſy, Thomas Blythe heritor in Kennoway pariſh, —— Weems, lady Colvil, John Adam bailie of Strathmiglio, James Pryde in Nether Urquhart, David Coventry and John Henderſon in Arlary, Robert Stark in mills of Forth; William Page, John White, and Richard Clidſdale in Cowpar of Fife, lady Balcanquell, colonel Robert Halket, John Smith in Dundee, John Balfour in Lethum, Alexander Walker in Friertoun, George Spence in Fordel, Patrick Melvil in Burnſide, —— Wardlaw heritor in Kirktoun, Colvil, lady Baily in Dinnino pariſh, James Grieve and Andrew Kinnier in St Andrews, James Lothian in Kingſbarns; Mr James Bonnar of Greggſtoun, John Scot in Lathones, lady Collerny, David and Alexander Campbells in Kirkcaldy, William Livingſtone of Greenyards, —— Farquharſon of Shilbrae, James Somervel at the boat of Cardroſs, Harry Dow of Weſterpolder, Mr John King chaplain to the lord Cardroſs, John Dalk portioner of Murdiſtoun, James Muir portioner of Burdiſtoun, lady Pittendreich in Logie pariſh, Robert Fork portioner of Kilpatrick, John Starks elder and younger of Balknock, —— Symer of Brathnes, William Crawford of Powmill, John Lundy of Baſſtard, Mr James Lentron and his ſpouſe, John Collier of Lochgelly, dame Anna Riddel lady Collerny, —— ladies Uathanks elder and younger, John Fairfoul of Kinloch, dame Margaret Farquhar ladyhill, —— Hamilton relict of Francis Galloway of Todihaugh, Simon Alexander feuar in Kirkliſton, and James Wilkie tenant in Cliftonhall. The great crimes for which theſe were intercommuned, were their preaching or hearing at conventicles, or not appearing when ſummoned, when they knew that by appearing they muſt either renounce their principles, or fall a ſacrifice to the reſentment of their perſecutors. They choſed therefore to keep out of the way; and now they were intercommuned, not only declared rebels, (that many of them were before) but by theſe letters they were cut off from all ſociety in the kingdom of Scotland; and it was declared, That whoſoever ſhould receive, harbour, or converſe with them, either by word or writing, or any other way, or ſupply them with meat, drink, clothes, or any other of the accommodations or neceſſaries of life, ſhould be purſued with rigour, as guilty with them of the ſame crimes; and all ſheriffs, &c. and their deputes, were ordered to apprehend them wherever they can be found. The reader therefore cannot be ſurpriſed that they quitted their habitations, and wandered about from place to place, not like a ſort of banditti, as biſhop Burnet does wantonly, if not wickedly, ſay, but rather as faithful confeſſors, who being perſecuted in one place fled to another, according to the direction of their great Lord. And as to their falling into a fierce and ſavage temper, as the ſame hiſtorian ſaith, though like might beget like it had been no wonder. However, the moſt that can with truth be ſaid of them is, that they looked upon and repreſented their perſecuters as enemies to God as well as to them, which they had too great reaſon for doing.

On the ſame 6th of Auguſt the council wrote to the earl of Moray to put the laws in execution againſt keepers of conventicles in the ſhire of Elgin and the neighbouring places. There were not many preſbyterian miniſters in the north of the Tay; however there were ſome, as Mr John MacGilligen, Mr Anderſon Mr Fraſer, and Mr Thomas Roſs, who had much of the divine preſence with them, and great ſucceſs attending their miniſtry this ſummer. Mr MacGilligen, with other preſbyterian miniſters in that country, were intercommuned, yet this did not diſcourage them in their work. But, as many ſerious people longed for the adminiſtration of the Lord's ſupper, ſo, after much pains in preparing them for that ſolemn ordinance, both by public preaching and from houſe to houſe, he adminiſtered that ſacrament in September, at Obſdale, in the houſe of the lady dowager Fowlis. He was aſſiſted by Mr Hugh Anderſon miniſter at Cromarty, and Mr Alexander Fraſer miniſter then at Tyriot, afterwards at Abbotſhall; and ſuch an effuſion of the ſpirit of God was vouchſafed on that occaſion, that, however many in this age may look upon theſe things as enthuſiaſtic, yet the eldeſt Chriſtians there declared they had never been witneſſes to the like. The people ſeemed to be in a tranſport, and ſome were almoſt at that, Whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell. And even the hearts of ſtrangers were wrought upon. So that however they were perſecuted by men, yet they were owned by God.

At this communion they were very providentially kept from diſturbance; for the deſign of the ſolemnity taking air, Sir Roderick MacKenzie of Findon, the ſheriff depute, at the inſtigation of the biſhop, ſent a party to apprehend Mr MacGilligen. But when they came to Alnes, the place of his reſidence, where they expected to have found him, they ſpent ſo much time in pillaging his orchard, that the forenoon's ſervice was over before they got to Obſdale, upon which the miniſters retired; and the party not finding Mr MacGilligen, marched off, and thereby gave them an opportunity of meeting again unmoleſted in the afternoon. However, this good man was obliged to abſcond, and we ſhall relate what he ſuffered next year in its proper place.

On the 2d of September the council committed Sir Patrick Hume of Polwart, afterwards earl of Marchmont, to priſon, for refuſing to contribute for the ſupport of the garriſons above mentioned, which he juſtly looked upon as a ſenſible encroachment upon the liberties of the ſubject; and becauſe when a ſentence was paſſed againſt him, he gave in a bill of ſuſpenſion to lord Collingtoun, and took inſtruments upon his refuſal of it; this was conſtructed an high affront to be born with.

Next day all the indulged miniſters in the ſynod of Glaſgow got a charge of horning to pay the ordinary dues to Ludovick Fairfoul clerk to the ſynod, and to Mr David Clunie their burſar. Some paid, others refuſed. The ſame day the council wrote to the king, complaining of Polwart's giving in a bill of ſuſpenſion to the lord Collingtoun, and that they had impriſoned him on that account. On the 15th of October they received his majeſty's anſwer approving of their conduct, and requiring them to declare him incapable of all public truſt, and to ſend him priſoner to Stirling caſtle.

On the 4th of November the Rev. Mr Thomas Roſs, in the ſhire of that name, was apprehended for conventicles, and impriſoned in Tain, and afterwards ſent to the Baſs, where he continued for ſome time with others of his brethren.

Little more occurs during the reſt of this year; only in December the council gave a commiſſion, much of the ſame nature with the former, to the two archbiſhops, and the earls of Seaforth and Dundonald, concerning conventicles, which were the eye-ſore of the prelates. On the 16th of December the council, finding that Mr James Mitchel had endeavoured to make his eſcape, ordered him to be ſecured in a cloſer place in the tolbooth.

I ſhall only obſerve, that, as many in the ſhire of Berwick appeared againſt the arbitrary proceedings of theſe times, ſo the fines levied by the earl of Home in that ſhire, during this year, for non-conformity, amounted to 26,666 l. 13 s. 4 d. Scots; whereof, in the pariſh of Gordon

Gordon alone, 33281. 4 s. Scots. From which the reader may eaſily form a judgment of the vaſt oppreſſion of the people, by the fines impoſed for non conformity and conventicles.

CHAP. XI.

Of Mr Mitchell's torture: the proceedings of the council: the circumſtances of the indulged: the proſecutions for conventicles: the occaſion of the Highland hoſt, and other occurrences to the end of the year 1677.

NOtwithſtanding the letters of intercommuning, and the ſevere penal laws in force, and though the ſoldiers in the garriſons were diligent in haraſſing, robbing, wounding, and impriſoning whom they reckoned haunters of conventicles, yet theſe meetings could not be ſuppreſſed. The miniſters would preach, and the people would hear, being 'in nothing terrified by their adverſaries.' The Lord's ſupper was likewiſe adminiſtered in ſeveral places. Mr John Law, after the revolution one of the miniſters of Edinburgh, diſpenſed that ordinance, in the night time, to a numerous meeting at Kippen, being aſſiſted by Mr Hugh Smith and Mr Matthew Crawford. Mr Alexander Jamiſon and Mr Hugh Smith adminiſtered the ſame ordinance at Haggs near Glaſgow; and at another time Mr Smith adminiſtered it to his own pariſhioners at Eaſtwood, aſſiſted by Meſſ. William Thomſon, John Ray, and Matthew Crawford, which proved ſealing times to many. (Mr Jamiſon died ſome time this year. He had been profeſſor of philoſophy at St Andrews, and had a patent to be profeſſor of divinity, but did not accept, though all knew he was well qualified for it, being a perſon of great piety and learning.) Theſe things much galled the biſhops, wherefore they ſet the managers to work in order to put a ſtop to them. But, to be more particular,

About the beginning of the year 1676, duke Hamilton went to London, where the king was pleaſed to hear ſome of his complaints againſt Lauderdale, in preſence of the duke of York, the earl of Athol, (now made a marquis) and others. The former urged the miſerable circumſtances of many country people, who were fined, confined, baniſhed, &c. for their non-conformity, and all through ill advice and unjuſt repreſentations made to the government. Lauderdale, on the other hand, accuſed Hamilton, and kept his ground, ſo that at length Hamilton left the court. The former thus prevailing, things were carried with a high hand againſt the non-conformiſts.

On the 6th of January, Mr Henry Knox, the epiſcopal miniſter at Dunſcoir, complained, that on the 28th of December laſt, his houſe had been robbed, himſelf and wife beat by ſix or ſeven perſons; and on the 27th the miniſter of Gargunnock complained of a riot of the ſame kind: wherefore the council, on the 10th of February, fined the heritors of Dunſcoir in 5000 merks, and thoſe of Gargunnock in 6000, to be paid to their miniſters. Theſe miniſters would have had no cauſe to complain had they met with a riot once every year.

Mr James Mitchel, having been ſome years in priſon, and having refuſed to own what he had confeſſed before the council, in preſence of the juſticiary, was ordered, this 6th of January, to be examined by torture, concerning his being in the rebellion 1666, as it was called. But ſeeing there was no proof of his being in that inſurrection, and that it had happened near ten years before, it was certainly hard meaſure to torture him for that now. However, a committee was appointed, of which the earl of Linlithgow was preſes. Mr Mitchel was brought before them on the 18th of January, about ſix in the evening. The earl told him, He was brought before them to ſee whether he adhered to his former confeſſion. He anſwered, 'My lord, it is not unknown to your lordſhip and others here preſent, that, by the council's orders, I was remitted to the lords of juſticiary, before whom I received an indictment at my lord advocate's inſtance, whereby I was to be forfeited of life and fortune, although I have no fortune. To which indictment I anſwered at three ſeveral diets. And the laſt diet being deſerted by my lord advocate, I humbly conceive, that, both by the law of the nation, and practice of the court at that time, I ought to have been ſet at liberty; yet notwithſtanding I was, contrary to law, equity and juſtice, returned to priſon; and upon what account I am this night before your lordſhips I know not.' The preſes told him, he was not accuſed before them either upon life or fortune, but called to ſee whether he would own his former confeſſion. Mr Mitchel anſwered, That he knew no crime he was guilty of, and therefore no ſuch confeſſion as was alledged.' Upon this the treaſurer-depute ſaid, The pannel was one of the moſt arrogant cheats, liars and rogues he had known. The priſoner replied, 'My lord, if there were fewer of thoſe perſons you have been ſpeaking of in the nation, I ſhould not now be ſtanding this night at the bar.' After ſome farther diſcourſe he was remanded to priſon.

On the 22d he was again brought before them in the lower council houſe, when a paper was produced, alledged to be ſubſcribed by him; and being interrogated as above, he ſaid, My lord, I acknowledge no ſuch thing. The preſes ſaid, Sir, you ſee what is on the table, (meaning the boots) I will ſee if theſe will make you do it. Mr Mitchel ſaid. 'My lord, I confeſs, that, by torture, you may cauſe me to blaſpheme God, as Saul did compel the ſaints; you may compel me to ſpeak amiſs of your lordſhips, to call my ſelf a thief, a murderer, &c. and then pannel me upon it: but if you ſhall, my lord, put me to it, I here proteſt before God and your lordſhips, that nothing extorted from me by torture ſhall be made uſe of againſt me in judgment, nor have any force in law againſt me or any other perſon. But to be plain with you, my lords, I am ſo much of a chriſtian, that whatever your lordſhips ſhall legally prove againſt me, if it be a truth, I ſhall not deny it; but, on the contrary, I am ſo much of a man, and a Scotſman, that I never held myſelf obliged by the law of God, nature, or the nation, to be my own accuſer.' So that, ſtill perſiſting in refuſing to own the ſubſcription of the paper they had produced, he was again ſent to priſon.

On the 24th of January, the priſoner was brought before the juſtices, and the executioner and the boots were preſented. He was again interrogated, as above; but, perſiſting in his refuſal, he was tied in an elbow chair, and ordered to be tortured with the boots. The executioner aſking which of the legs he ſhould take; the lords ſaid, Any of them. And he taking the left, Mr Mitchel ſaid, Since the judges have not determined, take the beſt of the two, for I freely beſtow it in the cauſe, and ſo he put his right leg in the engine. Upon this the advocate deſired leave to ſpeak a few words, but continued his diſcourſe for a conſiderable time. Upwards of thirty queſtions were propoſed to Mr Mitchel, particularly concerning the affair of Pentland, to ſee if they could find him in a contradiction. But perceiving their deſign, and the wedge pinching the boot, and paining him moſt ſenſibly, he ſpoke as follows. My lords, (not knowing that I ſhall eſcape this torture with my life) I beſeech you to remember what Solomon ſaith, 'He who ſheweth no mercy, ſhall have judgment without mercy.' And if there be any here preſent, as I hope there are few or none, whoſe diſpoſition is ſo eager in purſuing after innocent blood, that nothing elſe than a full draught will ſatisfy them; I ſay, let ſuch remember what is ſpoken Rev. xix. 2. 'For true and righteous,' &c. And now, my lords, I do freely and from my heart forgive you, who are judges ſitting on the bench, and the men who are appointed to be about this horrid work, and alſo thoſe who are vitiating their eyes beholding the ſame; and I do intreat that God may never lay it to the charge of any of you, as I beg that God may be pleaſed, for his Son Chriſt's ſake, to blot out my ſins and iniquities, and never lay them to my charge here nor hereafter.'

The queſtions being all over, the executioner took down his leg from a cheſt, where it lay all the while in the boot, and thruſting in his ſhelves began his ſtrokes, at each of which they aſked if he had any more to ſay, He anſwered, no more, my lords. There were nine ſtrokes given on the wedge, at the laſt of which he fainted through the extremity of pain; ſo that the executioner cried out, My lords, he is gone, he is gone. Then they commanded to leave off the torture, and, riſing from their ſeats, went away; after which he was carried back to priſon in the chair in which he was tied during the torture. We ſhall hear more of him afterwards.

It is true Mr Mitchel had made a confeſſion upon the promiſe of his life; but the managers having revoked their promite, becauſe he would not adhere to his confeſſion before the lords of juſticiary, and to be his own accuſer, the reader muſt determine how far he was to blame now, in not owning his confeſſion judicially, as they had judicially revoked the condition upon which the confeſſion was made; and to put a man to torture, for finding out things for which they had not the leaſt proof, ſeems to be unprecedented and cruel; and to bring him to a farther trial, after torture appears to be unjuſt.

On the 10th of February ſeveral perſons were fined for being at conventicles, as Durham of Largo, 1200 l. Scots for harbouring Mr John Welſh, and 2500 l. for being at two conventicles where he preached. This was either the ſecond or third time that this gentleman was fined. Edward Gilleſpie was fined in 200 l. R. Richardſon 100 l. Colonel Ker and lady Whiteſlaid 500 merks each, and Meſſrs. Stuart, Stirling, Hamilton, 100 l. Scots a piece; all for being at a houſe conventicle in Edinburgh; and that they might be puniſhed twice for the ſame fault, the magiſtrates were likewaies allowed to fine them for their relief. Such was the juſtice of theſe times!

At this time ſome priſoners in the tolbooth of Stirling met with an uncommon piece of ſeverity. About the end of 1674, fifteen men were impriſoned at Stirling for being at a conventicle; eight of them, by ſome intereſt, got out after 15 months confinement, the other ſeven laid their deplorable caſe before the council. Charles Campbell, one of theſe, was upwards of 60 years of age, John Adam near 70, and ſome of the reſt were under great bodily indiſpoſition: but ſuch were the tender mercies of theſe councellors, that they made a preſent of them to one captain Maitland, an officer in the French ſervice. An order came for this end to the magiſtrates of Stirling, ſigned by Linlithgow, Haltoun and Collingtoun. Accordingly, when every thing was got ready, about midnight, on the 18th of February, the poor men were all (except one John Paterſon who was let out ſome days before as in a dying condition) brought forth without having the leaſt previous notice, and delivered to about 50 foot ſoldiers who carried them off fettered and tied to one another; but ſuch is the ſupport of a good conſcience and a good cauſe, that they all went off with chearfulneſs, leaving their wives and children behind them.

About this time lord Cardroſs ſent up a petition to the king; notwithſtanding his majeſty wrote to the council, the 24th of February, requiring them not to ſet him at liberty till he had made full payment of the fine impoſed upon him. In the ſame letter Sir Patrick Hume of Polwart and lieutenant general Drummond were ordered to be ſet at liberty, only the former was to remain incapable of all public truſt till further orders.

On the firſt of March the archbiſhop of St. Andrews, and the biſhops of Edinburgh and Aberdeen, were appointed to enquire if all the maſters of the univerſities and colleges had taken the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy according to law. Orders were likeways given for making a ſtrict inquiry, whether all magiſtrates of burghs and other inferior officers had ſigned the declaration, and to proſecute ſuch as had not.

The ſame day a very ſevere proclamation was emitted againſt conventicles, by which the decay of religion and increaſe of profaneneſs is aſcribed to the ſeparation from public worſhip, and the frequency of conventicles. But the truth is, the decay of religion, &c. was chiefly owing to the bad practices of the incumbent clergy, and the want of diſcipline in the eſtabliſhed church, as ſeveral of themſelves have acknowledged; whereas the preaching of the ejected miniſters in private houſes, and in the open fields, had a ſingular tendency to ſuppreſs vice, and turn many to righteouſneſs, and was remarkably bleſſed of God for theſe valuable ends; but every thing that was evil muſt now be attributed to conventicles. By the ſaid proclamation papiſts, according to the cuſtom of the times, were blended with preſbyterians; and magiſtrates were ordered to proſecute them, and apprehend intercommuned perſons and fugitives. However, papiſts were not much ſtartled thereat, for they knew that they had little to fear from the threatnings of this time. What follows was ſtill harder; all preachers who do not attend public worſhip, that is, hear the incumbents at their own pariſh churches, before the firſt of June, were to be puniſhed for non conformity. If this was not perſecution for conſcience ſake, the reader muſt judge what is. All who harboured the intercommuned were made liable to the ſame pains with them, and a reward of 500 merks were ordered to be preſently paid to any who ſhould diſcover ſuch. All inferior judges and magiſtrates were threatened if they did not execute the laws. The fine of 500 merks was impoſed upon each burgh, where a conventicle was kept, beſides the pains mentioned in their bond to the council. It was farther declared, that the heritors ſhall be fined in a year's rent of the houſe where any ſuch meetings ſhould be held; and to encourage informers, a part of this fine was promiſed to them. In ſhort, if any chaplain, ſchoolmaſter, or pedagogue, was entertained without a licence from the biſhop of the dioceſe, a nobleman was to pay 3000 merks, a gentleman 1200, and a burgeſs 600.

Great were the hardſhips of non conformiſts in England at this time; but nothing could exceed the perſecuting ſpirit the managers of Scotland diſcovered. The ſoldiers were the daily executioners of the laws. And now and then the council ſent ſpecial commiſſions to particular perſons for ſuppreſſing conventicles. Accordingly, on the ſaid firſt of March, a committee was ordered to ſit at Edinburgh, another at Glaſgow, another at Stirling and in Fife, and one for Aberdeen-ſhire, Moray and Roſs. I ſhall have occaſion to relate the proceedings of that at Glaſgow in its proper place; only at this time I obſerve, that a very ſtrict ſearch was made for conventicles and ejected miniſters in Glaſgow and other burghs, and the town of Perth was fined.

The clamour made by the epiſcopal clergy, in the beginning of the year, againſt the indulged miniſters for breaking their confinement and the inſtructions given them by the council, produced a new proclamation, dated the firſt of March, wherein particular notice was taken of the firſt four rules; but the two laſt, relating to their attending on the dioceſan meetings, and paying the dues to the clerk and burſer of the dioceſan ſynod, were omitted. The proclamation concludes thus: 'And whereas it is informed, that the ſaid outed miniſters, indulged as aforeſaid, at leaſt many of them, having violated and contraveened the foreſaid orders and inſtructions (upon which terms they were permitted and indulged to preach and exerciſe the other functions of the miniſtry) whereby many diſorders are occaſioned, the ſaid lords do therefore of new again command and require all theſe indulged miniſters to keep and obſerve the foreſaid orders and inſtructions in time coming, and ſpecially for keeping within the bounds of their own pariſhes, and celebrating the communion upon one and the ſame Lord's day, as they will be anſwerable at their peril. And ordain their preſents to be printed, and copies thereof ſent to the ſeveral miniſters.' And the ſame day, as my author found from the regiſters, the council 'diſcharged the nonconforming miniſters to admit any of the miniſters not licenſed by law to their communions or pulpits, and, if they diſobey, appointed the biſhop of the dioceſe to depoſe them.'

From this additional order, and the clauſe within the parentheſis (upon which terms they were permitted and indulged to preach and exerciſe the other functions of the miniſtry) one would be apt to imagine that this proclamation was intended to divide preſbyterians among themſelves; and it is certain the indulgence proved the occaſion of much diviſion. They who could not comply therewith on account of the eraſtianiſm that run through the whole of it, condemned thoſe who complied, as renouncing preſbyterian principles, becauſe it was ſaid that the obſervation of theſe inſtructions was the terms upon which they were indulged; and therefore when they accepted of the indulgence upon ſuch terms, they conſented to receive their miniſtry, and the free exerciſe of it, on theſe conditions; ſo that, whether they punctually obſerved them afterwards or not, the bargain was eſtabliſhed. And though theſe inſtructions, when firſt given, were not ex-

preſſly ſo called, yet the manner of propoſal was ſuch, as all who would not willingly be enſnared, might have been convinced, that ſo, and no otherwiſe, they were intended, and upon the matter, could bear no other conſtruction. On the other hand, they who had clearneſs to accept of the indulgence, though they could not obſerve the rules and inſtructions given, argued, that they did not look upon theſe as the conditions of their acceptance, but as the impoſitions of the magiſtrate; as the reader will ſee from a petition of the Rev. Mr Thomas Wylie, occaſioned by the above mentioned proclamation, of which I ſhall give the following abbreviate.

Moſt honourable,

'I would moſt willingly have forborn this addreſs, if not conſtrained thereto by your lordſhips late act—The act September 3. 1672, in its complex contrivance, with the other two of the ſame date, were not a little grievous to many, and to me: yet,—looking upon theſe rules in the ſecond act as enjoined ſub pœna, I reſolved (having an invitation from the people) thankfully to accept of the permiſſion,—and to anſwer, when challenged, for every breach of the rules, which I ever looked upon as orders, and not as terms, or conſiderations, upon which we were permitted to preach: neither can I look upon them, or any thing in the firſt contrivance, as ſuch; for terms upon which, &c. import a compact between the giver and receiver; but in this matter I knew of no ſuch thing. Your lordſhips only enjoined them,—with certification, as thoſe concerned will be anſwerable; ſo that—there is nothing in all theſe acts ſo much as intimating that your lordſhips intended any conſent or obligation, by way of condition, from the receivers of your offer; but—contented yourſelves with the intimation of your pleaſure with certification.—Your lordſhip's offer being free, the acceptance arbitrary, the rules not enjoined as conditions, but commands ſub pœna and the reſolution of miniſters, as to them being either to give a ſatisfying reaſon, or ſuffer with a good conſcience for neglecting them—I and others have been in readineſs, hitherto, to anſwer every one convincingly, who either out of malice were apt to reproach, or out of ſcruple to ſtumble at the leaſt uſe making of the allowance, as if we thereby had involved ourſelves in complying with an approbation of prelacy, eraſtianiſm, the ſupremacy in its full extent, &c. which things to approve were contrary to the known principles of preſbyterians. But now, it being your lordſhips pleaſure to impoſe theſe rules upon us as terms upon which we are permitted and indulged, &c. I confeſs,—though—I do not deny to the king's majeſty his juſt power about matters eccleſiaſtical allowed him by the word of God, and practiſed by the godly reforming kings of Judah, yet I dare not, becauſe of the awe of God upon me, do any thing, as my own proper fact and deed, that will involve me in ſuch approbation and compliances contrary to my conſcience; ſuch as the acceptance of the rules, under the notion of terms upon which, &c. or the obſervance of them impoſed as orders, would do.' Upon this he prayed for the free and full exerciſe of his miniſtry, without any ſtraitening impoſitions.

He alſo drew up another paper, containing ſhort and ſolid reaſons why preſbyterian miniſters could not in their practice fall in with the rules commanded by the council; but, as I have already given an abſtract of the grievances of ſeveral preſbyterian miniſters as to the indulgence, and particularly of Mr John Burnet, I muſt here refer the reader to Mr Wodrow, p. 430 and 431. Some other things relating to the indulged will fall in afterwards.

Mean while the committee at Glaſgow ſat down on the 6th of April. Sir George Maxwell of Nether-pollock and his ſon John, Sir Archibald Stewart of Caſtlemilk, the laird of Dunlop, James Hamilton of Aikenhead, Gabriel Hamilton of Weſtburn, Mr Hugh Corbet of Margray, Mr Nathan Hill of Lambhill, Patrick Hamilton of Neilland, gentlemen; Meſſ. Andrew Mortoun, Hugh Smith, Matthew Crawford and James Wodrow (after the revolution profeſſor of divinity at Glaſgow) miniſters; John Johnſton and Matthew Cunning merchants in Glaſgow, and others, were ſummoned before them, to declare upon oath what conventicles they had been at ſince 1674, what children they had baptized, and whether they had received or harboured intercommuned perſons. The two firſt, thro' the intereſt of ſome of the members, got off without ſwearing. As none of the miniſters and preachers appeared, they were declared rebels, and the ſoldiers had orders to apprehend them where ever they could. The reſt refuſing to ſwear were reputed guilty, and after being fined for as many conventicles as the committee thought fit, were impriſoned at Glaſgow, and from thence ſent to Edinburgh, where they continued in jail for ſome months.

During which time ſeveral occurrences happened. The council met on the 26th of April, when they had a letter from his majeſty, dated the 2d of January, ſignifying his royal pleaſure to take off the reſtraint from the biſhop of Dumblain, and from Meſſ. Turner, Robertſon, Cant and Hamilton, ordering the council to act accordingly; with which they complied.

At the ſame meeting, the better to ſuppreſs conventicles, the council extended their proclamation of the 8th of April 1669, to the whole kingdom, whereby every heritor, on whoſe eſtate any conventicle ſhould be held, was to be fined in 50 l. ſterling. However, it was eaſy for the managers to overlook themſelves in this caſe, and they would doubtleſs take care of that.

Next day the council ordered liſts of the intercommuned perſons, and of ſuch as were denounced and declared fugitives, to be tranſmitted to all ſheriffs and magiſtrates of burghs, in order to their being apprehended. And, being informed of ſome conventicles in the ſhire of Ayr, they appointed the earl of Dumfries, and others, to inquire thereinto, and to puniſh the guilty.

The indulged miniſters in the dioceſan ſynod of Glaſgow, having got a charge of horning to pay the ordinary dues to their clerk and burſar, they all made payment, except Meſſ. Anthony Schaw, Alexander Wedderburn, Ralph Roger, George Ramſay, John Spalding, John Bell, Robert Boyd, John Wallace, Robert Bell, William Tullidaff, William Maitland, Andrew Hutcheſon, Thomas Wylie and Gabriel Cuningham. Wherefore Fairfoul the clerk got a horning againſt them, and on the firſt of June gave them warning that he was to diſtreſs them. They repreſented their caſe in a petition to the council; but, though no anſwer is recorded, yet it ſeems the matter was dropt.

As the indulgence was very diſſatisfying to many conſcientious people, ſo, about this time, ſome young preachers began at their deſire to preach, on the Lord's day, in the borders of ſome of the pariſhes of the indulged, which theſe laſt apprehended was unneceſſary, ſince they conſtantly preached themſelves, and that it would tend to divide and diſtract the people; but the truth is, the indulgence itſelf, and the accepting of it, was the occaſion of the diviſions that afterwards broke out.

On the fifth of June the council received the reports from their commiſſioners for trying conventicles in Aberdeen-ſhire, Glaſgow, &c. and found that the lady Polmais in Stirling-ſhire had been before them, and declared upon her honour that ſhe was free from what they charged her with; but, refuſing to ſwear to their queſtions, had committed her caſe to the council. The laird of Balgony and his lady, with lady Kennet, were ordered to be denounced for not appearing before theſe commiſſioners. Mr Hugh Campbell at Muirkirk was ordered to be ſummoned before the council for preaching without a preſentation; and the magiſtrates of Glaſgow were appointed to produce Mr Alexander Gordon, or his ſureties, for holding a conventicle there.

The ſame day the council referred the proceſſes againſt Nether-pollock, Torrence and Daldowie, for keeping of conventicles, to the commiſſion for public affairs.

About the middle of this month the following accident produced ſome remarkable alterations. While Mr James Kirkton (before the reſtoration miniſter at Martin, and miniſter in Edinburgh after the revolution) was walking in the ſtreet of Edinburgh, he was civilly accoſted by one captain Carſtairs, together with James Scot of Tullichaw, and a footman. As Mr Kirkton was going aſide with Carſtairs, he aſked Scot who he was; to which Scot replied with ſilence and ſtaring; whereby Kirkton found he was trepanned, and a priſoner. Carſtairs brought him to the houſe of one Alexander a meſſenger, and, ſending off Scot and his footman, carried him into a dark room. Then Kirkton asked what he meant. Carstairs replied, Sir, you owe me money. Mr Kirkton asked whom he took him for. Carstairs said John Wardlaw. Kirkton undeceived him, and ingenuously told him who he was; to that the other said, he had nothing to say to him.

After they had been together about half an hour, Mr Robert Baillie of Jerviswood, a relation of Kirkton's, together with Andrew Stevenson and Patrick Johnston merchants in Edinburgh, being informed of Mr Kirkton's circumstances, came to the door, and called to Carstairs to open, asking what he had to do with a man in a dark dungeon. Carstairs refused to open the door, and drew out a pocket pistol. Whereupon Kirkton grasped his adversary, and, in the struggle, both fell on the ground, and Kirkton called out, murder! Then Jerviswood and the two that were with him burst open the door, and parted them, without offering any violence to Carstairs, and rescued their friend.

Upon the misrepresentation of this affair to lord Halton by Carstairs and Scot, a council was immediately called; to whom Halton told that some of their public officers had catched a fanatic minister, but that he had been tumultuously rescued. Jerviswood was brought before them, and gave them a faithful account of the affair, so that the council would have dropt it, had not Sharp said, If Carstairs was not supported, and Jerviswood made an example of, there would be no prosecuting of the fanatics: and therefore the next council-day, June 22. Jerviswood was fined in 500 l. sterling, and kept four months in prison before he was released. He paid 2000 merks of his fine to Carstairs, and with no small difficulty was forgiven the rest. The council referred Andrew Stevenson and Patrick Johnston to the committee for public affairs, by whom they were fined, the former in 1000 l. Scots, and the latter in 1000 merks, and ordered to remain in prison till payment.

This was reckoned great injustice; for though it was pretended that Carstairs was a commissioned officer, and had produced his commission for apprehending ejected ministers, &c. at the council-board: yet he produced no warrant to Jerviswood and the rest when they rescued Mr Kirkton. Bishop Burnet tells us, 'That Bailie asked him what warrant he had to use him as he did; and that Carstairs said he had a warrant to carry him to prison, but refused to shew it.—And after he had made Kirkton go out, he said he was resolved to pursue Carstairs for this riot; but says Burnet, before the next council-day, a warrant for committing Kirkton, and six or seven more, was signed by nine privy-counsellors, but antedated. Lord Athol told the doctor, that he was one who signed it.' So that, as Mr Wodrow justly observes, the managers went upon a base forgery.

Mean while Mr Kirkton sent a true narrative to the duchess of Lauderdale. When the duke saw it he seemed surprised, and owned he had never met with two such different accounts, as that sent by Halton and this by Mr Kirkton. Soon after Mr Kirkton's letter and information were sent to the council. Halton was enraged at this, and misrepresented all who had spoke in favour of Jerviswood, as if they had agreed to subvert lawful authority, and were combined against the king, and for the fanatics. Accordingly a new nomination of the council came down, and all who would not submit to Halton and the primate were left out; as duke Hamilton, who had spoke much in defence of Jerviswood, the lord privy seal, the earl of Kincardin, the earl of Dundonald, and others. Kincardin and a few more went to court, and laid the affair before the king, but without any effect.

For, on the 20th of July, a new commission of council was sent down, wherein the archbishop of St Andrews was appointed to preside in absence of the chancellor. And the same day the two archbishops, the lord privy seal, the earls of Argyll, Mar, Moray, Linlithgow, &c. or any three of them, were appointed their committee for public affairs, and received commission and authority to meet when and where they pleased, and to take trial of conventicles, invasions of pulpits, &c. with power to summon, apprehend, bring under bond, and give what orders they thought proper to the forces, sheriffs, and other magistrates, and to consider the condition of prisoners, and to do all things necessary for his majesty's service, and make report to the council.

And now prelacy was at the height, for the two archbishops, with any third creature, had in a manner the whole management put into their hands. What a low pass must religion and liberty have been in, when the primate and other two in his chamber, might give what orders they had a mind?

The same day the council had before them several who had been imprisoned by the committee at Glasgow, and fined them as follows, viz. James Hamilton of Aikenhead 1000 l. Scots; Mr Hugh Corbet of Hargray, Mr Ninian Hill of Lambhill, and Gabriel Hamilton of Westburn 1000 merks each; Patrick Hamilton of Neilsland 300 l. Matthew Cumming 200 l. What came of the other, formerly mentioned, is not known: but as Alexander Wardrop of Dalmarnock gave his oath, and confessed his being at one conventicle, he was fined only in 50 merks; and they were all ordered to remain in prison till they paid their fines, which they quickly did.

The committee of council ordered all sheriffs, &c. to summon before them all who should be informed against by the conforming clergy, and to fine and imprison them, and give an account of their diligence to the council. Their under officers summoned multitudes; but people, finding they must give their oath super inquirendis, did not appear, and were therefore declared fugitives, and afterwards intercommuned. This obliged many to wander from place to place. However, God remarkably appeared for them, raised up friends to supply their necessities, and support them in their distresses. Which dispersing of ministers and people tended greatly to the spreading of the gospel. They who formerly preached to a few in private houses, now preached to multitudes in the fields, with great success, though at the utmost hazard. And as the vicious lives of most of the prelatical clergy had deaded many in their wickedness, so the faithfulness, integrity and holy zeal of these confessors were convincing proofs that there was a reality in religion, especially considering the remarkable judgments that now and then fell upon their merciless persecutors.

Such was the persecuting spirit that raged at this time, that it reached to places out of his majesty's dominions; for, by the influence of Sharp, the king was prevailed with to write to the states general of the united provinces, to remove James Wallace, Mess. Robert MacWard and John Brown out of their provinces. It is likely this James Wallace was the colonel of that name who was engaged at Pentland. But the states, being convinced of the unreasonableness of this demand, especially as Mess. MacWard and Brown had complied with the sentence passed upon them in the years 1661 and 1662, would not comply with it; and gave notice to lord Benningen their ambassador in England, to communicate their resolution in the most prudent way he could. The curious reader may see a translation of the worthy resolution of the states, dated the 31st of July, in Wodrow, Vol. I. p. 434, 435.

Though our managers could not obtain their ends abroad, yet they increased the persecution at home; for, on the third of August, the council intercommuned Mr James Kirkton, Alexr. Lenox, John Rae, David Hume, Edmund Jamison, Robert Lockhart, John Welwood, John Weir, Andrew Donaldson, Thomas MacGill, James Webster, burn, Thomas Douglas, Fran. Irvine, Alex. Bertram, and Alexander Wilson; and renewed their commission for suppressing conventicles in the northern shires, with a particular eye to Banff. They likewise past sentence in absence against above 40 in Fife, and about 30 or 40 more in Churnside and the country adjacent.

The same day Mr Alexander Forester was, by the council, ordered to the Bass, and Mr William Erskine and the laird of Bedlane, both in Stirling castle, to Dunbarton. At the same meeting, Mr Robert Steedman at Carsbie, Mr George Haliburton at Dalgety, and Mr James Dunn of the family of Dalhousie, were denounced for keeping conventicles, as were Alexander Gordon of Knockbrex, Henry MacCulloch of Barnholm, — Hay, of Arrochar, the old lady Monrieth, Robert MacClellan of Balmaghie, Patrick Vance of Drumblair, all in Galloway; Thomas Blak-

Blackwell and others, in Glaſgow, were denounced for alledged harbouring of intercommuned perſons; and Mr Douglas of Cavers was ſummoned to appear for keeping Mr James Osburn, as his chaplain, without the biſhop's licence, and not appearing they were both denounced and outlawed.

Whether this was the Mr Osburn, who was, after the revolution, profeſſor of divinity in the Marſhal-college of Aberdeen, I know not; but I was aſſured by his ſon, the late principal of that univerſity, that he was a very great ſufferer in this period; but, ſuch was his modeſty, he declined ſpeaking on that ſubject; ſo that the particulars are not known.

The ſame day Kerſland was ſent priſoner, along with Jerviſwood, to Stirling caſtle, where he continued ſome time. From thence he was ſent back to Dumbarton, and lay there till October 1677. The reader may now ſee how much buſineſs was tranſacted in one day; but, as the perſons were moſtly abſent, and the committee for public affairs had prepared every thing for voting, proceſſes could not be tedious.

On the ſixth of September, Robert Andrew in Culroſs was fined in 50 l. ſterling for keeping conventicles. And, on the 11th of October, the council being informed that Mr John MacGilligen, was apprehended in Moray, ordered him to be brought to the priſon of Edinburgh. The ſufferings of this valuable perſon, ſince the eſtabliſhment of prelacy were many. And the manner of his being apprehended was remarkable. Being called to baptize a child of his dear brother Mr Hugh Anderſon, he ſtayed at his houſe all night. And that night, at three different times, he dreamed that there were three men come to the houſe to apprehend him. Though he was no obſerver of dreams, yet the repetition of the ſame thing made him thoughtful. He committed his caſe to God, and had ſcarce got up and was dreſſed, when three of Seaforth's ſervants came and ſeized him, and carried him to Fortroſe, where he was ſome time in priſon, and, in a ſpeech to the provoſt, bore an excellent teſtimony againſt prelacy.

From thence he was ſent to Nairn; and about the beginning of February he and Mr Hog were brought up to Edinburgh, where Mr Hog was impriſoned, but Mr MacGilligen was ſent to the Baſs, where, for ſome time, he was not allowed a ſervant to make his bed, being forced to do all theſe ſervile offices for himſelf. But he has left it on record, that the upper ſprings flowed liberally and ſweetly, when the nether ſprings were imbittered to him. And though, through the intereſt of lord MacLeod, he had afterwards ſome more liberty, yet here he contracted a gravel which put an end to all his ſorrows.

Mr William Bell and Robert Dick were, upon the 12th of October, both ſent to the Baſs for a field-conventicle near Pentland hills. And, on the 6th of November, the council, being informed that Mr Patrick Hamilton, brother to the laird of Halcraig, had preached in a private houſe at Edinburgh, fined Mrs Mary Hepburn, lady Saltoun, in 200 l. Scots, and her daughter Mrs Mary Lidingtoun in 200 merks, for being preſent; and ſent Mary Baldine and Beſſie Muir to priſon, till they ſhould find bail for 1000 merks each to remove from the town of Edinburgh and ſix miles round it. At the ſame ſederunt they releaſed Mr Andrew Kennedy of Clowburn, upon a bond of 10,000 merks to appear when called, though nothing criminal could be proved againſt him.

And ſuch was the zeal of the managers, that, on the 30th of November, the council fined James Dunlop of Houſtill in Renfrew ſhire, in the ſum of 1000 merks, for neglecting his duty in ſuppreſſing conventicles, and declared him incapable of acting any more as bailie-depute of the regality of Glaſgow. Though nothing could be laid to his charge, except that he could not keep pace with the prelates in perſecuting thoſe who heard the goſpel. However, he was afterwards reſtored to his office, but, being unacceptable to the archbiſhop and others, he did not long continue in it.

On the 7th of December Mr John Law, late miniſter at Campſie, being called and not appearing, was ordered to be denounced. He was charged for keeping conventicles, handling pulpits, and being concerned in ordaining perſons for the miniſtry. Two days after this the town of Edinburgh was fined in 50 l. ſterling for a conventicle lately held there. I ſhall now end the tranſactions of this year with an account of ſome who ſuffered, but the particular dates I know not.

For ſeveral years the Rev. Mr Andrew Donaldſon, late miniſter at Dalgety, continued to preach in a gentleman's houſe in the country, till, through the inſtigation of the prelates, he was intercommuned on the 3d of Auguſt this year. Although he was now old and infirm, and did not preach except ſometimes on the Sabbath evening to his own family, and a few others who came to hear him, yet for this cauſe, a party of ſoldiers came one night and carried him out of his bed to the priſon of Linlithgow, where he continued more than a year. The commander of the party, by whom he was apprehended, died under great horror of conſcience for the part he acted in this matter. In the months of April or May 1679, he gave the earl of Argyll warning of his after ſufferings and death, as the noble peer told ſeveral in the caſtle of Edinburgh a few days before his martyrdom. Mr Donaldſon continued under trouble till the year 1687.

Gilbert Macilwraith of Dinmurchie, a gentleman of a moderate eſtate in the ſhire of Ayr, was this year intercommuned merely for not appearing. In the year 1680 he was forfeited with many others in abſence, and the gift of his eſtate and moveables was made over to the earl of Glencairn. His wife and children were very rudely treated, being expelled their houſe with nothing but their clothes on their back, and a child in the craddle. All this and much more was proved before the committee of parliament after the revolution.

In the year 1677 things grew ſtill worſe. Meſſ. John Welſh, Gabriel Semple, Samuel Arnot and John Scot of Hawick, having laſt year been obliged to retire to England, they were very uſeful in Cumberland and Northumberland, reclaiming ſinners, and inſtructing many who ſcarcely had the goſpel ever preached among them before. Some went alſo to the north of Ireland, where they were of great ſervice.

In the beginning of this year a great number of preſbyterian miniſters, indulged and not indulged, aſſembled at Edinburgh, and Mr Ralph Roger was choſen their moderator. Some, ſuch as the Rev. Mr MacWard, looked upon this as an eraſtian meeting, ſince ſeveral of the indulged were members of it, and ſince the motion made by the Rev. Mr Blackadder was treated in a manner with contempt; for, when he propoſed that they ſhould firſt ſet ſome days apart for faſting and humiliation on account of their defections, ſome cried out, Diviſve, diviſve, and others, Come, let us unite. Mr Welwood, Mr Cameron, and a third, were called before this meeting for preaching ſeparation from the actually indulged; but they declined them, as not a lawfully conſtitute and qualified judicatory. Be theſe things as they will, the miniſters thus aſſembled did not take upon them the authority of a general aſſembly; but gave it as their opinion that the ſentences inflicted on the proteſtors 1661, ſhould be reverſed, that the indulged and not indulged ſhould preach with one another without diſtinction, and that the indulged ſhould not confine themſelves only to their own pulpits. They had likewiſe a good deal of debate concerning indefinite ordination, whether, eſpecially in the perſecuted ſtate of the church, miniſters might not be ordained, without any proſpect of a ſettlement among a particular congregation; but they came to no reſolution.

Conventicles ſtill abounded notwithſtanding the ſanguinary laws in force. Mr Welſh, &c. returned to the ſouth and weſt in ſpring. The ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper was adminiſtered in the fields near the water of Girvan in Ayr-ſhire, where thouſands were preſent, and great ſucceſs attended the preaching of the goſpel on that occaſion.

As a price was ſet upon Mr Welſh's head, he ſtill travelled about with ſome of his friends armed in their own defence. The conforming clergy magnified theſe meetings, as if the whole of the preſbyterians were in arms; and the biſhops gave out that an inſurrection was intended, notwithſtanding ſuch a thing was far from any of their thoughts.

On the 6th of January a letter came from the king to the the council, making void all the commiſſions about the militia formerly granted to duke Hamilton, which no doubt they carefully intimated to him.

On the 28th Mr James Fraſer of Brae was apprehended about ten at night, when engaged in family worſhip, and carried directly to priſon. He had his ſhare of ſufferings during the preceding years, was one of thoſe who had been intercommuned about two years before, though none whom he valued ever ſhunned his company for that. He was next day brought before a committee of council, but, as he himſelf relates it, was charged with no crime, but only examined, and verbally accuſed as a ſeditious perſon, who did rend the church of Chriſt. That the reader may have a ſpecimen of their enſnaring proceedings, I ſhall mention a few of their queſtions, with his anſwers. Qu. 'Did you ever preach in the fields? Anſ. Your lordſhip knows, that that, according to your law, is criminal; and I am not obliged to be my own accuſer. It is enough that my throat be cut, though I do it not with my own hands. If you have a mind to ſtage me on that, bring my accuſers, and then proceed as your lordſhip thinks fit. Biſhop. Though theſe ſhifts be taken from others, yet they muſt not, Sir, be taken ſo from a man of parts. Dundonald. Sir, you would gain the good-will of the committee by being ingenuous and free. I aſſure you none of us have any ill will at you, or intend to take any advantage of you, or of any of your party, from any thing you ſay. Anſ. I thank your lordſhip. Halton. Did you ever preach at Linlithgow? Anſ. It may be I have. Biſhop. Yes, Sir, you have, and in the fields there too, and that to great conventicles. Anſ. I deſire that may be proved.' He was likewiſe interrogate as to his principles concerning government, and frankly owned his averſion to prelacy; but, ſays he, 'As to my loyalty, I would not care much though all ſaw what was in my heart anent it.' In ſhort, nothing was proved againſt him. Nevertheleſs he was, after examination, remanded to priſon. His pockets were ſearched for letters, &c. and all company diſcharged. But he remarks, that 'the Lord was a light round about him, and him they could not ſhut out.' Next morning he was wakened by one of the jailors, and ordered to make ready to go immediately to the Baſs, for ſo the council had appointed. Accordingly he and Mr James Mitchel who had endured the torture were conducted thither by a party of 12 horſe and 30 foot. He remained there two years and a half. But after the affair of Bothwel the king granted an indemnity, and ordered that all priſoners for non conformity, who had not been in that riſing, might be ſet at liberty. Accordingly, in July 1679, he and other miniſters were brought from the Baſs to the priſon of Edinburgh, and in 24 hours time, upon finding bail for 8000 l. ſterling to appear when called, was ſet at liberty. Sir Hugh Campbell of Calder was bail for Mr Fraſer in the ſum of 5000 merks Scots; nevertheleſs he continued in a wandering condition till November 1681, when we ſhall meet him again.

Mr Andrew Foreſter, having been lately apprehended in Fife, was upon the 8th brought before the council, and ordered to be kept cloſe priſoner in Edinburgh. There had been a meeting of about 50 or 60 of the ejected miniſters on the 20th of May 1676 to whom he was clerk. When he was taken, their minutes were found about him, and upon his refuſing to relate the particular circumſtances of it, he was impriſoned as above.

The ſame day Scot of Pitlochie was ſent to the Baſs, and Meſſ. Thomas Blackwell, William Stirling and Robert Fork were ordered to be brought in priſoners to Edinburgh. An information was given to the government, after the revolution, that Mr Blackwell was committed to priſon 1677 for conventicles, when under a moſt violent fit of the gravel. However, one night, the door being open, and the jailor drunk, he and William Stirling a fellow-priſoner got out for which the magiſtrates of Glaſgow were fined in 10,000 merks, but the moſt of it was remitted after the indemnity 1679. Mr Blackwell was purſued by thoſe who were bail for the jailor, and again committed to priſon, where he continued for a long time much afflicted with the gravel and was obliged to tranſact for 7000 merks to his purſuers, the greateſt part of which he paid, though William Stirling was not at all purſued.

This year the excellent lord Cardroſs ſuffered further hardſhips. However, on the 8th of February, he was permitted to go out of priſon till the 18th on account of his lady's indiſpoſition.

On the 13th the council gave a commiſſion to lord Maxwell a papiſt, to apprehend preſbyterian miniſters and others, and to levy 5000 merks of fines lately impoſed on the pariſh of Dunſcoir for a riot. Such was their zeal againſt popery! On the 22d Robert Blac and William Gray of Colroſs were ſeverely fined for conventicles. And on the 1ſt of March the council wrote to the earl of Strafforth, ſeverely reprimanding him for having granted a warrant to the ſheriff of Nairn to give ſome liberty to Mr MacGilligen; for they had been informed that that ſheriff had, for ſome time before he was ordered to apprehend Mr MacGilligen kept him as a chaplain, and ſuffered him to preach and keep conventicles. The ſame day they allowed lord Cardroſs to go about his affairs, upon a bond of 1000 l. ſterling, for every offence committed by him or his lady, which we ſhall find was afterwards rigorouſly exacted.

Great care was taken at this time to have the youth educated to their mind. Accordingly, on the 6th of March the council made an act diſcharging all ſtudents from being admitted to academical degrees, unleſs they took the oath of allegiance and declaration; and ſignifying that the maſters ſhould be deprived if they conferred any degrees upon other terms. The ſame day letters were ordered to be ſent to the ſheriffs, bailies of regalities, &c. to encourage them in proſecuting thoſe who went to conventicles, by informing them that they were to have the fines of all below heritors for their own uſe. They likewiſe appointed the earls of Linlithgow and Wintoun, the lords Elphinſton and Belhaven; the treaſurer-depute, the advocate, and lord Collingtoun, or any three of them, to be the committee for public affairs.

The biſhops being, it ſeems, diſpleaſed that many went from Edinburgh to Dalmenie to hear Mr Alexander Hamilton the indulged miniſter of that place, the council, on the 7th of March, removed him to Delſerf. The compliances of ſome of the indulged gave offence to many, being judged inconſiſtent with preſbyterian principles.

On the 4th of April, the council, in a letter to Lauderdale, complained of the increaſe of conventicles, and that, when the preacher or hearers were proſecuted, they repaired to England; and therefore earneſtly begging that his majeſty would provide a remedy for this evil.

On the 2d of May letters were ſent, by order of the council, to many of the royal burghs, to be more careful in ſuppreſſing of conventicles; and the ſame day Robert Bennet of Cheſters was brought before them for being at a field-meeting, where they alledged the king's forces were reſiſted; and the ſoldiers who apprehended him and Mr Blackwell were allowed 10 l. ſterling out of the fines for each of them. Orders were likewiſe ſent to colonel Borthwick, to place guards at the gates of the city of Glaſgow on the Sabbath day, to prevent people from going thence to theſe meetings: nay, they diſcharged all the ejected miniſters, who did not enter into their confinement 1672, from entering into any churches, declaring that, for the future, they would indulge no more. This doubtleſs was very acceptable to the prelates.

Next day, May 3d the earl of Dumfries repreſented to the council, that Mr William MacMillan of Caldow, in the pariſh of Balmaclellan in Galloway, had, for ſome time, been impriſoned at Dumfries for non-conformity, and prayed that he might be let out and confined to the bounds of his own pariſh, which was complied with. This excellent perſon, after the eſtabliſhment of prelacy, was greatly perſecuted by Mr Moir the epiſcopal miniſter and Sir James Turner, ſo that he was obliged to leave his mother's family, diſperſe his own, and live like a fugitive the beſt way he could. Though he was not at Pentland, yet Sir William Bannantyne quartered his men on his family, detained him and ſeveral other priſoners in the houſe of Earlſtoun. His houſe was ſpoiled, his furniture ſeized, tho' he had given a bond containing a penalty of 1000 l. to anſwer the council, or juſticiary, for any thing that could be laid to his charge. This gentleman went frequently to Ireland, till at laſt he was licenſed to preach 1673 by the the preſbyterian miniſters of the county of Down. When engaged in this work, he was informed againſt by the prelates and the earl of Nithſdale, who ſent two of his militia troop, with ſome other violent papiſts, who apprehended and carried him priſoner, firſt to Kirkcudbright, and then to Dumfries, where, without any accuſation, he was continued priſoner 35 months without intermiſſion, to the great prejudice of his health.

On the ſame 3d of May Mr James Drummond was ordered to be brought to the tolbooth of Edinburgh, becauſe when formerly ſet at liberty, he engaged not to keep conventicles, and yet was taken preaching; and the committee for public affairs, in their report to the council, gave it as their opinion, that he ſhould be ſent to the Baſs. My author obſerves, that, if he made ſuch a promiſe, he was almoſt the only preſbyterian miniſter that did ſo at this time; that they all gave bond to appear when called, but none of them would engage not to preach.

The 28th of June the committee for public affairs reported to the council their proceedings againſt the preſbyterian miniſters in their hands. Mr Wodrow has inſerted their report at large, Vol. I. p. 447, &c to which I muſt refer the reader. The ſame day the council fined Mr Bennet of Cheſters in 400 merks for conventicles, and for hearing and converſing with Mr Welſh, and ordered him to remain in the Baſs till payment: they likewiſe fined Adam Stobie of Luſcar in 3000 merks, and after he paid the fine he was baniſhed the kingdom: and the ſame day John Anderſon of Dowhill younger (ſeveral times provoſt of Glaſgow after the revolution) was brought before the committee for public affairs, and accuſed for being at many conventicles, and for a ſeries of non conformity, and refuſing to ſwear was reputed guilty, and, becauſe he would not hear his pariſh miniſter, was fined in 500 l. ſterling, and ordered to ly in priſon at Edinburgh till he paid it. He remained there till the beginning of October, when he was releaſed upon his paying 2000 merks.

On the 19th of July the council gave a commiſſion to Sir William Murray of Stanhope, and to ſome officers of the militia, to diſperſe conventicles in the ſhire of Peebles, and the ſame day Mr Robert Trail, ſon to Mr Robert Trail miniſter at Edinburgh, was brought before the council, and acknowledged that he had kept houſe-conventicles. But being aſked, if he had preached at field conventicles, he referred that to proof, becauſe the law made it capital. He owned he had converſed with Mr Welſh when on the Engliſh border, and that he was ordained to the miniſtry by Preſbyterian miniſters at London 1670. But refuſing to clear himſelf by oath, he was therefore ſent to the Baſs. Major Johnſton got 1000 l. Scots for apprehending him. This Mr Trail was afterwards an uſeful miniſter to a congregation of diſſenters in London. His ſermons on the Throne of grace, the Lord's prayer, and John xvii. 24. are much eſteemed by many.

On the 24th of July Sir Alexander Bruce of Broomhall, for not obliging his tenants to ſubſcribe the bond, was fined in 1200 l Scots: and the ſame day they made an act ordering heritors to be ſummoned for conventicles as well as tenants, in order to be made liable for their fines, if it ſhould appear they had not obliged them to ſubſcribe the bond, as required by the proclamation the 18th June 1674, which put multitudes of gentlemen to a great deal of trouble. Accordingly James Smith of Tullochſhaugh, and many heritors in the ſhires of Lanerk and Renfrew, were charged to appear before the council on the 7th of Auguſt, to be examined as to their being at conventicles, their neglecting to take bond of their tenants, and to give their oath upon theſe articles, otherways to be accounted guilty. The ſummons to Tullochſhaugh was dated the 20th of July, two days after the council granted the priſoners in the Baſs liberty to walk every where above the walls, except Mr James Mitchel, who was ordered to be kept cloſely confined.

But, before I proceed to relate what immediately followed upon theſe proceedings, it ſeems proper to obſerve, that, either in June or July this year, the duke and dutcheſs of Lauderdale came down to Scotland, and that one of the dutcheſs's daughters, by her firſt huſband, was married to the lord Lorn, afterwards the firſt duke of Argyll. The other was deſigned for the marquis of Athol's eldeſt ſon, but that did not take effect.

The preſbyterian miniſters in Glaſgow, Paiſley, Irvine, and Hamilton, judging it proper to addreſs his grace, pitched upon Mr Matthew Crawford to go to Edinburgh to conſult with Mr John Carſtairs. A meeting of miniſters there approving the motion, employed Mr Anthony Murray, a relation of the dutcheſs of Lauderdale. He got acceſs to the duke, and humbly entreated his grace to interpoſe with the king for taking off the letters of intercommuning laid on ſo many miniſters, and releaſing their brethren in the Baſs and other places, and that they might have liberty to meet for drawing up a ſupplication to the king's majeſty. The duke told him, that he was ready to do all the ſervice he could to him, but would grant no favour to that party, being (as he ſaid) unworthy of any. From this the miniſter concluded, that evil was determined againſt them; however, next council-day, when ſeveral lords repreſented that the preſſing of the bond would ruin their tenants and lay their lands waſte, the duke began to talk pretty openly of a third indulgence, and ſoon ſignified his inclinations to ſundry preſbyterian miniſters by lord Melvil. But when the two archbiſhops complained of this to the duke, it is ſaid he told them, that he intended no liberty to the preſbyterians at all; only it was convenient to keep them in hopes till an army was raiſed to ſuppreſs them, which was now in agitation.

On the 2d of Auguſt John Cuningham of Bedlane was releaſed from his confinement, upon giving bond and ſecurity to re-enter when called. Then the council emitted a new proclamation, by which all heritors, wadſetters, and liferenters, were required to engage themſelves by bond, not only for themſelves and families, but for all that lived under them, that they ſhould not keep or be preſent at any conventicle, or baptize or marry with ejected miniſters, under the higheſt penalties contained in the former acts. See Wodrow's appendix, No. 79.

The ſame day lord Cardroſs was ſummoned to appear on the 7th of Auguſt, before the council, for two irregular baptiſms, two of his children having been baptized by perſons who were neither his own pariſh miniſters, nor licenſed by the council. His lordſhip gave them a plain repreſentation of the caſe, acknowledging that, during his long confinement, he had a child born in the town of Edinburgh; and that, not being permitted either to attend his lady in her labour, or diſcharge the other duties relating to the child, he was not in a capacity to conform to the act of parliament in that caſe; he only knew that the child was truly and Chriſtianly baptized, but never inquired by what miniſter it was done. Notwithſtanding whereof Cardroſs was fined in half a-year's valued rent.

The ſame 7th of Auguſt the lady Kinnel was fined in 5000 merks, and the lady Pitlochie in 1000, for being at conventicles. And, to render the ends of the laſt mentioned proclamation the more effectual, the council, on the ſame day, erected a kind of high commiſſion, authoriſing ſeveral noblemen and gentlemen to put the laws againſt conventicles and other diſorders in execution. The commiſſioners had certain bounds aſſigned them. The lord treaſurer was appointed for the ſhire of Edinburgh, —— for Linlithgow, the marquis of Athole for Perth, the earle of Hume for Merſe and Teviotdale, &c. They were to inform themſelves of all perſons within the bounds aſſigned them, who withdrew from public ordinances, went to houſe or field conventicles; of all diſorderly baptiſms and marriages, &c. and report their diligence once every three months to the council.

When the laſt proclamation and bond came weſt, it much alarmed the noblemen, gentlemen, and heritors; for they reckoned it the hardeſt thing that could be, that they ſhould oblige themſelves for thoſe that were not in their power, and be required to do what was impoſſible; and alledged, that many of the counſellors could not ſafely bind themſelves for their own families, and therefore how could country gentlemen be bound for multitudes under ſevere penalties?

Upon this a conſiderable number of noblemen, gentlemen, and heritors of the ſhire of Ayr met, and, having choſen the earl of Loudon preſes, agreed upon a letter to the council, excuſing themſelves for refuſing a bond which they could not keep, and propoſing another expedient for ſecuring the peace of the country, even the granting a farther farther liberty to preſbyterians. This was taken ſo ill by the managers, that the excellent nobleman who ſigned the letter was never more in favour; ſo that, after enduring ſundry hardſhips, he left his native country, and died at Leyden.

The proclamation met with no better treatment in Clidſdale. Duke Hamilton was no friend to it, and the heritors of Lanark unanimouſly agreed to refuſe the bond. This oppoſition a little ſoftened the ſevere inſtructions and commiſſions at the council's meeting in October, when they made an act agreeable to the report then given in by the committee for public affairs, 'That if any perſon that is ſummoned be ready to ſwear, or pay his fine, he ſhall not be troubled with bonds, or other engagements, ſince the conſtant puniſhment of tranſgreſſors will ſupply the neceſſity of bonds, and ſince the law itſelf is the ſtrongeſt bond that can be exacted of any man,' &c. However, theſe continued but a very ſhort while.

On the 10th of Auguſt, according to the author of the hiſtory of indulgence, there was a proclamation, in which it is declared, that, ſince divers of the indulged miniſters had neglected their inſtructions given them by the council, all heritors, &c. were diſcharged from paying any part of their ſtipend for the year 1677, and in time coming, without a ſpecial order and warrant from the council. However, at this time many indulged miniſters were ſummoned to appear before the council, but there were few or none who appeared. Mr James Currie was before them on the 7th, and being accuſed for being at a conventicle, he owned, that, as the conventicle was in the corner of his own pariſh, he went to expoſtulate with the preacher for withdrawing his people from him; and this being his caſe he was diſmiſſed. But Mr James Greg being called and not appearing, his indulgence was declared to be forfeited, and he diſcharged from preaching any more in Carſtairs. At the ſame time the council being informed that the indulged miniſters did not keep their inſtructions, a new copy was ordered to be ſent to each, ſignifying, that, if they break them, they ſhould be immediately turned out, and otherwiſe cenſured. They having likewiſe information that Mr — Gilchriſt had been ſettled in the pariſh of Carſphairn, after the death of Mr John Semple, ordered him to be diſpoſſeſſed, and brought in priſoner to Edinburgh. Now, ſince the indulged were put to theſe hardſhips, the reader, I ſuppoſe, will not be ſurpriſed that others, who had not freedom to accept of any indulgence, and yet exerciſed their miniſtry where they had opportunity, had the hardeſt meaſure of ſufferings.

The prelatic party was very ſtrong at this time in the council; for though ſome were for moderate meaſures, as Argyll, the preſident, Stair, Sir Thomas Wallace of Craigie, and a few more, yet the generality were for carrying things to the utmoſt extremity. Upon the 4th of September Sir George MacKenzie of Roſehaugh was admitted a privy counſellor, and about this time Sir John Niſbet, who had been his majeſty's advocate for ſeveral years, was turned out and ſucceeded by Sir George, who was greatly inſtrumental in the after ſufferings of the preſbyterians; ſo that the prelates themſelves could never charge him with any thing like moderation.

At the ſame ſederunt a letter from the king, dated the 24th of Auguſt, was read, ſignifying it was his royal pleaſure, that, for the future, all the officers of ſtate ſhould accept their commiſſions durante beneplacito. By this means all the inferior officers were made to depend on him who had the king's ear. But, though this was Lauderdale's contrivance, it was afterwards turned againſt him.

On the 9th of October the committee for public affairs gave it as their opinion, that Mr Robert Trail, Scot of Pitlochie, Mr James Drummond, and Mr Fraſer of Brae, ſhould be ſet at liberty from the Baſs, upon giving bond to appear when called. But, notwithſtanding this, Mr Fraſer was continued through the particular ſpite of the primate. I know not what the council did as to the reſt. Only Mr Alexander Peden was ordered to be let out of the Baſs, upon obliging himſelf to depart from Britain, and not to return under a ſevere penalty. Several others had ſome liberty granted them by this ſederunt, as Meſſ. Hog, MacGilligen, and Thomas Roſs; but it was the eve of a ſevere perſecution.

Though conventicles greatly increaſed this year, yet both miniſters and people behaved in a moſt peaceable manner: nothing of diſloyalty could be laid to their charge, notwithſtanding the finings, confinings, impriſonments, denouncings, and intercommunings they endured. A paper writ by a gentleman of a very good intelligence at this time, ſays, That, by a ſober computation, it appeared, that, before the end of this year 1677, near 17 000 were thus harraſſed; but ſtill they met peaceably. It is true ſeveral of them came with arms, in order to defend themſelves from the barbarous outrages of the ſoldiers, which was a great handle to the prelates, who, upon hearing of the deſign of any farther favour to thoſe who could not in conſcience ſubmit to abjured prelacy, left no ſtone unturned to defeat the deſign. In order to this they raiſed a mighty cry That the church was in danger from an intended inſurrection, which had not the leaſt foundation. The following incident was alſo aggravated.

Carſtairs, who had been very diligent in haraſſing the preſbyterians in the eaſt parts of Fife, had turned out lady Colvil from her houſe, ſo that ſhe was obliged to conceal herſelf for ſome time in the fields and mountains, which greatly impaired her health. His fellow went round the country with about a dozen of men, having no other warrant but the archbiſhop's commiſſion, under pretence of ſearching for denounced and intercommuned perſons, and committed many outrages. About the beginning of October, ſix or ſeven gentlemen being in the houſe of John Balfour in Kinloch, Carſtairs came with his company while one of the gentlemen was accidentally at the door. Philip Garret, an Iriſh tinker, one of Carſtair's gang, advanced, and, without aſking a queſtion, or reciting the leaſt proclamation, fired at the gentleman, but happily miſſed him. However, Garret followed into the houſe. By this time the gentlemen being alarmed, one of them fired at Garret, and wounded him in the ſhoulder, ſo that he fell. Mean while Carſtairs and his men fired in at the windows at the gentlemen and wounded one of them. Upon this the gentlemen, in their own juſt and neceſſary defence, made a ſally, and put Carſtairs and his men to flight. But no more blood was ſhed, only Kinkell's horſe was ſhot, and Garret received ſome ſlight wounds with a ſword. Carſtairs informed the council in his own way; ſo that this was looked upon as an high act of rebellion. The gentlemen, and ſeveral others, were ſummoned before the council, and not appearing, were all denounced rebels. This affair was charged upon the whole body of preſbyterians, though it was ſome time before it was known in the weſt country. However, as this happened juſt when the biſhops wanted a handle, they carefully improved it.

Accordingly, on the 17th of October, the council wrote to the earls of Glencairn and Dundonald, and the lord Roſs, in order to aſſemble the commiſſioners of the militia, and juſtices of peace, mentioned in an incloſed letter, in the ſhires of Ayr and Renfrew, at Irvine, on the ſecond of November next to come, in order to concert proper meaſures for ſuppreſſing conventicles, and that on account of the extraordinary inſolences committed againſt the orthodox clergy, by ſtirring their pulpits, threatening, or abuſing their perſons, ſetting up of conventicle-houſes, and keeping of ſeditious and ſcandalous conventicles in the fields, the great ſeminaries of rebellion, &c.

As to inſolences, &c. except it was one or two inſtances, ſays my author, and that on no ſmall provocation, not one of thoſe riots that came before the council were in the ſhires of Ayr and Renfrew. And as to the invading of pulpits, it is owned, that, upon a vacancy, and at the invitation of the heritors and people, preſbyterian miniſters did ſometimes preach in them. In ſhort, the whole of this application to theſe gentlemen was but a ſham, for they had concerted meaſures among themſelves; only there muſt be ſome time to bring them to bear, as appears from a reſolution of the council the day before the gentlemen were to meet.

Mean while, about the end of October, the advocate was ordered by the council to proſecute Mr James Mitchel for for his intended aſſaſſination of the biſhops of St Andrews and Orkney. They likewiſe received a letter from Lauderdale, acquainting them with the deſigned marriage of the prince of Orange to the princeſs Mary, the duke of York's eldeſt daughter; for which they wrote a letter of compliment to his majeſty, expreſſing the greatneſs of that happineſs they expected from this match; and they commanded public rejoicings in the city of Edinburgh on that occaſion.

As the marriage of the royal houſe of Stuart with papiſts, have been the great plagues of the three kingdoms, and have brought our religious and civil liberties frequently to the very brink of ruin, ſo their marriages with proteſtants have been as great bleſſings, not to us only, but to the whole proteſtant church. To theſe it is we are indebted, firſt, for the glorious revolution, and, next, for the illuſtrious family which now happily fills the throne: and had the managers ſeen the conſequences of the happy intended marriage intimated to them at this time, it is to be queſtioned whether they would have been ſo forward in their rejoicings.

About this ſame time Mr Ker of Kerſland was ordered to confine himſelf in the town of Irvine, and a mile round it, being within five miles of his own houſe at Kerſland. He had ſome time allowed him to go with his family, then at Glaſgow, to the place appointed. When he came to his family at Glaſgow, he was viſited by many of his friends and acquaintances. But the ſame night, when he was conducting the lady Caldwell and her daughters home, he and Robert Hamilton of Airdry were both apprehended by ſome of the king's life guards at Glaſgow, and kept in the guard-houſe till next day. Major Cockburn, the commanding officer, was willing to releaſe Kerſland, only detained him till the archbiſhop's pleaſure was known, who, as a counſellor, ordered him to be made cloſe priſoner in the tolbooth, and immediately rode to Edinburgh. The lady Kerſland followed, to prevent miſinformations. During this a fire broke out at Glaſgow, and the priſon being in danger, I am informed that ſeveral of the inhabitants went to the magiſtrates, deſiring that the priſoners might be taken out, leſt they ſhould periſh in the flames; and, upon their refuſal, the people took the ſtrongeſt ladder they could find, and as many as were able laid hold on both ſides of it, and with united force burſt open the doors and releaſed the priſoners; among whom Kerſland got his liberty. Mr Wodrow ſays, that after this he retired, and abſconded all that winter, during the ſpring, and following ſummer, when he kept company with the perſecuted miniſters, heard the goſpel preached by them in the fields, till he retired to Utrecht, where he died the 14th of November 1680. However, it would ſeem, that, after he was ſet free at Glaſgow, he was ſome way or another retaken, and ſent priſoner to Edinburgh; for, p. 456, he ſays, Upon the 29th of November, Robert Ker of Kerſland, and Durham of Largo, priſoners in Edinburgh tolbooth, are ordered to be liberate without any conditions, which was not common at this time.

On the firſt of November the committee for public affairs informed the council that they had ordered two men to be ſcourged for a riot on the miniſter of Torphichen, and two more for a riot on the miniſter of Borrowſtounneſs, which met with the council's approbation. The ſame day they turned out Mr John Welwood from the kirk of Tarboltoun, and ordered him to be apprehended. And, about a fortnight after, Mr James Forthie, chaplain to the Trinity-hoſpital at Edinburgh, was turned out for being at a conventicle.

As an evidence that the council's ordering the heritors of Ayr and Renfrew to meet at Irvine, to fall upon proper methods for ſuppreſſing conventicles, was all ſham, and that they had concerted meaſures among themſelves, on the 1ſt of November, the day before theſe gentlemen were to meet, they came to the following reſolution, viz. 'Upon ſome information of ſome growing diſorders and inſolencies in the weſtern ſhires, it was thought fit a proclamation be drawn, in caſe of an inſurrection, and the neareſt Highlanders ſhould be ordered to meet at Stirling upon advertiſement by proclamation; and letters are to be writ to noblemen and gentlemen, to have their vaſſals and tenants ready and at a call. It was further thought fit that arms and ammunition ſhould be ſent to Stirling. The forces at Glaſgow are ordered to Falkirk, and new men are to be preſently levied to complete them, and the ſoldiers ordered for the Highlands countermanded.' Though they might be informed of a deſigned inſurrection, yet there was no ground for it. But now the Highlanders, men too univerſally accuſtomed to theft and rapine, muſt be made reformers! A contrivance becoming Scots biſhops.

On the ſecond of November, the heritors of Ayr and Renfrew met at Irvine, as they were ordered, and, after a good deal of reaſoning upon the council's letter, they unanimouſly came to three reſolutions. 1. That it was not in their power to ſuppreſs conventicles. 2. That it is their humble opinion, from former experience, that a toleration of preſbyterians is the only proper expedient to ſettle and preſerve the peace, and cauſe the foreſaid meetings to ceaſe. 3. That it is their humble motion, that the extent thereof be no leſs than what his majeſty had graciouſly vouchſafed to his kingdoms of England and Ireland. Theſe reſolutions they communicated to the three noblemen by whom they were aſſembled. But their lordſhips, knowing how unacceptable it would be to the council, declined receiving it, and the gentlemen would make no alteration. And therefore the three lords, on the 8th of November, ſent a letter to the council, ſignifying, that the gentlemen had declared that it was not in their power to quiet the diſorders.

Though the leading men in the council appeared diſſatisfied with this refuſal, yet it is probable it was what they wanted, that they might have a handle to proſecute their cruel intentions againſt the weſt country. Accordingly they now reſolved to execute their project formerly agreed to, of raiſing ſuch a number of the ſavage Highlanders as might over-run and depopulate the weſtern ſhires, though in a time of profound peace. It does not appear that they had as yet any orders of this from court, and therefore they were obliged to wait for ſome time till the king's letter came down to impower them to act. Mean while they were not idle in preparing for the execution of their deſign.

Accordingly, on the 15th of November, the council ordered the commiſſioners of the militia to meet at Edinburgh on the 17th, under the ſevereſt penalties, and the guards to muſter on Larber-muir on the 29th. On the 26th four companies of ſoldiers were ordered to be quartered about Edinburgh. Next day they eſtabliſhed a poſt betwixt Edinburgh and Port patrick for correſponding with Ireland; for the king being informed of the danger of an inſurrection, for which there was not the leaſt ground, not only offered them the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh forces, but likewiſe commanded the viſcount of Granard to march the Iriſh forces to the coaſt, to be in readineſs to come over to Scotland upon a call. However, the Highland hoſt anſwered the end of the managers, without the aſſiſtance of foreigners. The ſame day they wrote to the abſent councellors to be preſent next council-day. Accordingly on the 6th of December they met, and wrote to the earls of Huntley, Perth, and Airly, to have their men in readineſs to march.

The ſame day Mr James Mitchell, formerly mentioned, was brought from the Baſs to Edinburgh.

On the 17th the council ordered Dr James Leſlie, principal of the Mariſhal-college of Aberdeen to be apprehended and ſent to Edinburgh. He had written to the biſhop of London reflecting on the council and the duke of Lauderdale, and his letters ſome way or another came into their hands; and therefore he was deprived of his place, ordered to beg his grace's pardon, and then was ſet at liberty.

On the 20th the council met, and received the king's letter for raiſing the Highland hoſt, of which I cannot but inſert the following abſtract.

CHARLES R.

Right truſty and well beloved, &c. We have been very much concerned at the accounts we have had, not only out of Scotland, but from ſeveral other hands, of the great and inſufferable inſolences lately committed by the fanatics, eſpecially in the ſhires of Ayr, Renfrew, Stewartry of of Kirkcudbright, and other adjacent places, and also in Teviotdale, and even in Fife, where numerous conventicles, which by act of parliament are declared rendezvouses of rebellion, have been kept, with solemn communions of many hundreds of people, and seditious and treasonable doctrine preached against our person and all under us, inciting the subjects to open rebellion, and to rise in arms against us, and our authority and laws, unlawful oaths imposed, the churches and pulpits of the regular clergy usurped, by force invaded, and their persons still threatened with assassination and murder, and (what they have not formerly attempted) preaching houses have been lately built, and unlawful meetings of pretended synods and presbyteries kept, thereby designing to prosecute their rebellious intentions, and to perpetuate the schism.

These insolencies, being so recent, have moved us to provide fit and timeous remedies; and therefore we have appointed some of our English forces to march to the north near the Scotch border, and a part of our army in Ireland to ly at Belfast, near the sea coast towards Scotland.

We have been with much satisfaction informed, that you have required the noblemen and others, who have interest and considerable vassalr—in the Highlands and places —adjacent, to be in readiness with what forces they can bring out, to rendezvous at Stirling, and from thence to march with our standing forces, upon the first advertisement, for the prosecution of our service. And, seeing we are fully resolved to maintain and defend the government of the church in that our kingdom, as it is now established by law,—therefore we do hereby require and authorise you to command all these forces before mentioned—to march to these shires and places—so infested with rebellious practices, and there to take effectual courses for reducing them to due obedience to us and our laws, by taking free quarters from the disaffected, and by disarming of all you shall find necessary, and securing all horses above such a value as ye shall think fit, by causing the heritors and liferenters to engage and give bond for their tenants, and others who live upon and possess their lands, that they shall keep no conventicles, that they shall live orderly and obedient to the laws, and by causing the tenants and masters of families give the like bonds; by causing every parish, and the heritors of it give surety that no conventicles shall be kept within any part of the parish, property, or commonry, nor harbour or commune with the rebels, or persons intercommuned; and for keeping the persons, families, and goods of the regular ministers harmless, and that under such penalties as ye shall think fit, by causing all heritors, tenants, liferenters, and others, take the oath of allegiance to us, by using and prosecuting all other means and methods—for—putting at last an end to those insolences and disorders; and, in case of resistance, that, in our name, you give warrant to resist them by force of arms.

And, for the more effectual prosecution of these our commands, that you punish the disobedient, or those you judge disaffected, by fining, confining, imprisonment or banishment. And farther, that ye place sufficient garrisons in all places where ye shall from time to time find it necessary. And if, at any time hereafter, ye shall judge that these forces ye have prepared are not sufficient for this undertaking, we do impower and authorise you to call to your assistance those of our forces now lying in the north of England and the north of Ireland, one or both, as ye shall find cause —

And, lastly, we do authorise and require you to call together our militia of that our antient kingdom,—and to command and charge all heritors, freeholders, and others, and, if need be, all betwixt fifty and sixteen, to come and attend our host, under the pain of treason, according to the ancient laws of that our kingdom; and that ye emit —such proclamations, as ye shall find it necessary for this our service from time to time,—And so we bid you heartily farewel. Given at Whitehall, December 11. 1677.

In consequence of this letter from his majesty, the managers agreed to raise an army, known in Scotland by the name of the Highland host. Accordingly, on the 26th of December, a commission passed the seals for raising the Highlanders and others, and forming them into troops and companies. By virtue of this commission they were to be at Stirling by the 24th of January next; in their march they were to take, and, if the same should be refused, force quarter for their money: nay, by this commission they had authority to take free quarter, as the council or their committee should appoint, and, if need be, to seize on horses for carrying their sick men, ammunition, or provisions. In a word, they were indemnified against all pursuits, civil and criminal, on account of killing, wounding, apprehending, or imprisoning such as should oppose them.

One would imagine, from such mighty preparations, that the whole nation was upon the point of being invaded. But all this was for the suppressing of conventicles, and distressing those who had given no provocation, further than that they could not abandon their religious principles, and submit to abjured prelacy; and therefore an army of Highlanders must force it down their throats. Perhaps some of the managers might expect that the oppressions of the Highland army, now to be raised, would force the people to take arms, and so a fine handle would be given to make a sacrifice of them to the resentments of the prelates and the duke of York. Notwithstanding the people generally adhered to their principles, and at the same time patiently endured their sufferings.

CHAP. XII.

Of the trial and execution of Mr James Mitchel; the proceedings of the council and committee; the bond of conformity; together with the ravages of the Highland host during the months of January and February 1678.

THE first two months of the year 1678 present us with a series of oppression as unprecedented as barbarous. Several noblemen and gentlemen, foreseeing the terrible effects of the measures now pursuing, resolved to go to court, and give the king a faithful account of the circumstances of Scotland. But, when this took air, the bishops and Lauderdale, in order to frustrate the design, procured an act of council to be passed on the third of January, discharging all noblemen, gentlemen and heritors from leaving the kingdom without the council's permission, and requiring all between 60 and 16 to be in readiness to join the king's host. And as duke Hamilton was of the greatest rank and interest in the west, the council on the same day, wrote to his grace, signifying their resolution, that a committee of the council should go along with his majesty's forces, who were to rendezvous at Stirling, and to march west from thence for his majesty's service, and requiring him to meet the said committee at Glasgow, the 26th of this instant, and to receive and obey such orders of the council, or the said committee, from time to time, as should be thought necessary.

The same day Lauderdale, at the command of the council, wrote to the earl of Cassils, requiring him, as bailie principal of Carrick, to attend the said committee, at Glasgow the 25th instant, and receive, and obey their orders, which his lordship did accordingly.

It was now determined to prosecute Mr James Mitchel; and therefore, on the third of this month, Sir Geo. Lockhart and Mr John Ellis were appointed to plead for him before the justiciary. Bishop Burnet says, 'Things being then in great disorder, by reason of the numbers and desperate tempers of those who were intercommuned (he should rather have said, by reason of the illegal, cruel and arbitrary proceedings of the managers) Sharp pretended he was in great danger of his life, and the rather because the person who made the attempt upon him was let live still; and therefore Sharp would have his life, and duke Lauderdale gave way to it.' Sir Archibald Primrose, lately turned out of the register's place, was made justice general. He fancied, says Burnet, that orders had been given to raze the act that the council had made, but turning to the books, he found the act still on record. So he took a copy of it, and sent it to Mr Mitchel's council, and a day or two before the trial went to Lauderdale, who, together with Sharp, lord Rothes, and lord Halton, were summoned as the prisoner's witnesses. Primrose told Lauderdale that many thought a promise of life had been given; the latter stiffly denied it: and the former said, ſaid, That he heard there was an act of council made about it, and wiſhed that that might be looked into. Lauderdale ſaid he was ſure it was not poſſible, and he would not give himſelf the trouble to look over the books of council.

His trial began on the 7th of January. The great proof brought againſt him was his confeſſion the 10th of February 1674. Many and long were the reaſonings upon the points in the indictment; and Sir George Lockhart argued, in behalf of the priſoner, with great judgment and learning, to the admiration of the audience, ſhewing, that no extrajudicial confeſſion could be allowed in court, and that his confeſſion was extorted from him by hopes and promiſe of life. I muſt refer the curious reader to Mr Wodrow's appendix, where he will find the defences, replies and duplies at large, No. 93. The debates were ſo tedious, that the court adjourned till the 9th of January.

Then, after ſome witneſſes were examined relating to the attempt upon the biſhops, the lord advocate produced his witneſſes for proving Mr Mitchel's confeſſion. And, firſt, the earl of Rothes, being ſhewn Mr Mitchel's confeſſion, ſwore, That he was preſent and ſaw him ſubſcribe that paper, and heard him make the confeſſion contained therein, and afterwards ratify the ſame at the council-bar, in the preſence of the king's commiſſioners, the lords of priy-council ſitting in council, and that he had ſubſcribed the ſaid confeſſion; but that he did not at all give any aſſurance to the priſoner for his life; that the priſoner never required any ſuch aſſurance; and that his lordſhip does not remember that there was any warrant given by the council to his lordſhip for that effect; and, ſays he, if there be any expreſſions in any paper, which may ſeem to infer any thing to the contrary, he conceives it hath been inſert upon miſtake. Charles Maitland of Halton and the duke of Lauderdale ſwore much to the ſame purpoſe.

Then archbiſhop Sharp, ſwore, that that day the panel or priſoner did fire at his grace, he had a wave of him paſſing from the coach, and paſſing the ſtreet, which made ſuch impreſſion upon his grace, that, by the firſt ſight he ſaw of him, after he was taken he knew him to be the perſon who ſhot the ſhot. Depoſes his grace ſaw him at the council-bar, in preſence of his majeſty's commiſſioner and council, acknowledge his confeſſion before the committee, and heard him adhere thereto, and renew the ſame; and that there was no aſſurance of life given him, nor any warrant to any other to do it; only he promiſed, at his firſt taking, that, if he would freely confeſs the fault, and expreſs his repentance for the ſame at that time, without any farther troubling judicatories therein, his grace would uſe his beſt endeavours for favour to him, or elſe leave him to juſtice. But that he either gave him aſſurance, or gave warrant to any to give it, is a falſe and malicious calumny. And that his grace made no promiſe to Nicol Somervel other than that it was his intereſt to make a free confeſſion.' This Nicol Somervel offered to give his oath, that the archbiſhop promiſed to him to ſecure his life if he would prevail with him to confeſs. The archbiſhop denied this, and called it a villanous lie.

After theſe witneſſes were examined, the advocate declared he had cloſed the probation; whereupon the priſoner produced a copy of an act of council, 12th March 1674, praying that the regiſter might be produced, or the clerks be obliged to give extracts, which they had refuſed. 'Lockhart, ſays Burnet, pleaded, That ſince the court had adjudged that the council was a judicature, all people had a right to ſearch into their regiſters, and the priſoner who was like to ſuffer by a confeſſion made there, ought to have the benefit of thoſe books. But Lauderdale, who was in the court only as a witneſs, and ſo had no right to ſpeak, ſtood up and ſaid, That he and thoſe other noble perſons were not brought thither to be accuſed of perjury; and added, That the books of council were the king's ſecrets, and that no courts ſhould have the proſing of them.' In ſhort, this defence was rejected, and next day Mr Mitchel was brought in guilty, and condemned to be hanged in the Grais-market of Edinburgh on Friday the 18th inſtant.

As ſoon as the court broke up, the lords went up ſtairs, and, to their ſhame, found the act recorded and ſigned by lord Rothes the preſident of the council. 'This action ſays that hiſtorian, and all concerned in it, were looked at by all people with horror. And it was ſuch a complication of treachery, perjury and cruelty, as the like had not perhaps been known.'

Mr Mitchel, in a letter to a friend, from the tolbooth of Edinburgh, February 1674, ſays, That, as to his deſign againſt Sharp, 'he looked on him to be the main inſtigator of all the oppreſſion and bloodſhed of his brethren that followed thereupon, and of the continual purſuing of his life. And he being a ſoldier, not having laid down arms, but being ſtill upon his own defence, and having no other end or quarrel at any man, and ſo had a right to take every avantage againſt him. Moreover, we being on no terms of capitulation, but, on the contrary, ſays he, I, by his inſtigation, being excluded from all grace and favour, thought it my duty to purſue him on all occaſions.' A little further he ſays, 'I ſhall offer to your conſideration that paſſage, Deut. xiii. 9. wherein it is manifeſt, that the ſeducer or enticer to worſhip a falſe God is, to be put to death by the hand of thoſe whom he ſeeks to turn away from the lord,' eſpecially by the hand of the witneſſes, whereof I am one, as it appeareth Deut. xiii. which precept I humbly take to be moral, and not merely judicial or ceremonial. And as every moral precept is univerſal as to the extent of place, ſo alſo as to the extent of time and perſons.' After this he took notice of Phineas, Elijah, &c. and added, 'I know that the biſhops both will and do ſay, That what they did againſt the Lord's people, whom they murdered, they did it by law and authority, but what I did was contrary to both, I anſwer, the king himſelf, and all the eſtates of the land, and every individual perſon in the land, both were and are obliged by the oath of God upon them, to have extirpated the perjured prelates and prelacy; and, in doing thereof, to have defended one another with their lives and fortunes. —And now they vaunt of authority! But what authority do they mean? Truly I know not, except it be the authority of their aggregated gods, new gods, &c.

The reader will by this time perceive, that Mr Mitchel looked upon himſelf, as in a ſtate of war, and that Sharp was doubtleſs one of the chief inſtigators of the oppreſſion and bloodſhed of this diſmal period, he therefore thought he had a right to take every opportunity of cutting him off, eſpecially as all the ways of common juſtice were blocked up. However this matter will come again before us, when we ſhall relate how Sharp met with what he juſtly deſerved at God's hand.

But ſuppoſing Mr Mitchel's attempt unjuſtifiable, yet, conſidering the promiſe of life given him, it is plain, he was unjuſtly put to death, as was ſufficiently argued at his trial. Two days after the ſentence an order came from court for placing Mr Mitchel's head and hand on ſome public place of the city, but, as the ſentence was paſſed, no alteration could be made, and if this order was procured by Sharp's means, he miſſed his end.—About this time Mr Mitchel's wife petitioned the council that her huſband might be reprived for a ſhort time, that ſhe might be in caſe to ſee and take her laſt farewel of him, eſpecially as it was not 12 days ſince ſhe was brought to bed, and was then in a fever. But no regard was paid thereto; for, on the 18th, he was executed according to the ſentence. His laſt ſpeech being interrupted by the beating of drums, he threw it over the ſcaffold, and is as follows.

Chriſtian People,

IT being rumoured abroad, immediately after I received my ſentence, that I would not have liberty to ſpeak in this place, therefore I have not troubled myſelf to prepare my formal diſcourſe, or account of the pretended crime for which I was accuſed and ſentenced; neither did I think it very neceſſary, the fame of the proceſs having gone ſo much abroad, what by a former indictment given me, near four years ago, the diet whereof was ſuffered to deſert, in reſpect the late advocate could not find a juſt way to reach me with the extrajudicial confeſſion they oppoſed to me. All knew he was zealous in it; yet my charity to him is ſuch, that he would not ſuffer, that unwarrantable zeal ſo far to blind him, as to overſtretch the laws of the land beyond their due limits, in prejudice of the life of a native ſubject. Next by an extreme inquiry of torture, and then by exiling me to the Baſs, and, after all, by giving me a new indictment, at the inſtance of the new advocate, who before was one of mine, when I received the firſt indictment, and to which new indictment and debate in the proceſs I remit you, and particularly to theſe two defences of an extrajudicial confeſſion, and the promiſe of life given to me thereupon by the chancellor, upon his own and the public faith of the kingdom; upon the verity whereof I am content to die, and ready to lay down my life, and hope your charity will be ſuch to me, as a dying man, as not to miſtruſt me therein, eſpecially as it is notoriouſly adminiculate by an act of ſecret council, and yet denied upon oath by the principal officers of ſtate preſent in council at the making of the ſaid act, and whom the act bears to have been preſent, the duke of Lauderdale being then his majeſty's commiſſioner, likeways preſent; and which act of council was by the lords of juſticiary moſt unjuſtly repelled; but I ſhall have charity for ſome of the ſaid lords, who, I know, would have given law and juſtice as to my juſt abſolution, if they had not been overpowered with plurality of votes by thoſe who are overawed and dared by the lords of the ſecret council; but that will not abſolve their conſciences at the laſt day. As to my advocates and lawyers, I ingenuouſly acknowlege their care, fidelity, and zeal in my defence, which I hope will be a ſtanding fame to ſome of them for this and all future generations. Thus much for a ſhort account of this affair, for which I am unjuſtly brought to this place. But I acknowlege my private and particular ſins have been ſuch as deſerved a worſe death to me; but I hope in the merits of Jeſus Chriſt, to be freed from the eternal puniſhment due to me for ſin. I am confident that God doth not plead with me in this, for my private and particular ſins; but I am brought here, 'that the work of God may be made manifeſt, and for the trial of faith, John ix. 3. and 1 Pet. i. 7. and that I may be a witneſs for his deſpiſed truths and intereſts in this land, where I am called to ſeal the ſame with my blood. And I wiſh heartily that this my poor life may put an end to the perſecution of the true members of Chriſt in this place, ſo much actuated by thoſe perfidious prelates, in oppoſition to whom, and in teſtimony to the cauſe of Chriſt, I at this time lay down my life, and bleſs God that he hath thought me ſo much worthy as to do the ſame for his glory and intereſt. Finally, concerning a Chriſtian duty in a ſingular and extraordinary caſe, and anent my particular judgment concerning both church and ſtate, it is evidently declared and manifeſted elſewhere. So farewel all earthly enjoyments, and welcome Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, into whoſe hands I commit my ſpirit.

JAMES MITCHEL.

N B. The reader will find the teſtimony, referred to in the cloſe of this ſpeech, in the laſt edition of Naphtali, it being too long for this place.

I ſhall now proceed to affairs of a more public nature. When the deſign of the Highland hoſt was formed, as we have related, the chancellor Rothes went to Fife, and with much difficulty prevailed with moſt of the heritors to go into the following bond.

WE the noblemen, barons, and heritors of the ſheriffdom of Fife, under-ſubſcribing, faithfully bind and oblige us, that we, our wives, bairns, and ſervants, reſpectively, ſhall no ways be preſent at any conventicles or diſorderly meetings, in time coming, under the pains and penalties contained in the acts of parliament thereanent.

As alſo, we bind and oblige us, that our hail tenants and cottars reſpectively, their wives, bairns, and ſervants, ſhall likewiſe abſtain and refrain from the ſaid conventicles and other illegal meetings not authoriſed by law; and in caſe any of them ſhall contravene the ſame, we ſhall take and apprehend any perſon or perſons guilty thereof, and preſent them to the judge ordinary, that they may be fined and impriſoned therefore, as it is provided by the 8th of parliament made thereanent, otherwiſe we ſhall remove them and their families, from off our ground; and, if we fail herein, we ſhall be liable to ſuch pains and penalties as the delinquents have incurred by the law. And, for the more ſecurity, conſenting thir preſents be regiſtrated in the books of council, &c.

This bond was ſigned at Couper, on the 3d of January, and preſented to the chancellor on the 10th; and though the reader may perhaps think it was a pretty ſtrong obligation, yet our managers, not judging it ſufficient, inſiſted that the heritors ſhould ſign the following

Bond of Conformity.

WE the noblemen, barons and heritors of the ſheriffdom of Fife, under-ſubſcribing, faithfully bind and oblige us, that we, our wives, bairns and ſervants, reſpectively, ſhall no ways be preſent at any conventicles or diſorderly meeting in time coming, but ſhall live orderly in obedience to the law, under the pains and penalties contained in the acts of parliament thereanent. As alſo we bind and oblige us, that our hail tenants and cottars reſpectively, their wives, bairns and ſervants, ſhall likewiſe abſtain and refrain from the ſaid conventicles, and other illegal meetings not authorized by law. And farther, that we or they ſhall not reſet, ſupply or commune with forfeited perſons, intercommuned miniſters, or vagrant preachers, but do our utmoſt to apprehend their perſons. And in caſe our ſaid cottars, tenants and their foreſaids, ſhall contravene, we ſhall take and apprehend, &c. as in the former bond.

This new bond was ſent to the ſhire of Fife; and the ſame day the council ordered 100 men to be detached from the four militia regiments for ſuppreſſing conventicles there, and to be maintained by the ſhire. The pretence was, becauſe it was in this country that Mr Welſh began field conventicles, which afterwards ſpread through the kingdom.

About the ſame time the nobility and gentry of the ſhire of Ayr, apprehending that the Highland hoſt was chiefly intended againſt them, deputed five of their number to go to Edinburgh, and repreſent to the council that moderate meaſures would more effectually put a ſtop to the alledged diſorders, eſpecially as they could not obſerve the leaſt appearance of diſloyalty among the people, notwithſtanding their being addicted to conventicles; but Lauderdale would hearken to nothing, unleſs the gentlemen would preſently ſign the bond, and oblige themſelves for all the reſt of the heritors. This they could not do, and ſo returned as they came; nay, they could not obtain ſo much as a delay of the orders for the forces to march, until the gentlemen of the ſhire were met to conſider the terms propoſed; ſo bent were the managers, at the inſtigation of the prelates, to execute their cruel deſigns.

Though the general rendezvous of the forces was appointed to be at Stirling the 24th of January, and the committee of council to meet at Glaſgow the 26th, yet upon the ninth ſecret orders were given to the half of the regular forces, a ſquadron of horſe, and four companies of foot, to march weſt. Accordingly they entered Glaſgow on the 13th, being the Lord's day, in time of public worſhip, and immediately made a ſtrict ſearch for arms, and fugitive and intercommuned perſons. The biſhop of Argyll, and ſome others, had repreſented, that on that day, the ejected miniſters were to adminiſter the Lord's ſupper, and that an inſurrection was to follow. Whence the real ground of this fright, if it may be ſo called, was, that the preſbyterians in and about Glaſgow had kept the Tueſday before as a day of private faſting and humiliation in this time of calamity and diſtreſs. However the duke took, and the ſoldiers were quartered at Glaſgow, to prevent an inſurrection that was never thought of. John Anderſon of Dowhill was ſeized, but was ſet at liberty upon ſecurity to appear when called. The ſoldiers, though harbingers to the Highlanders, having behaved with the utmoſt inſolence, were greatly exceeded by their ſucceſſors.

On the 15th a train of artillery was ordered weſt, and 1000

1000 merks iſſued from the treaſury to defray the expences, though they had neither towns to beſiege nor armies to encounter. And, on the 18th, the marquis of Athol, the earls of Mar, Moray, Glencairn, Wigtoun, Strathmore, Linlithgow, Airly, Caithneſs, Perth and lord Roſs, were appointed as a committee of council to attend the army: of that number nine were officers in the army, or had brought down the Highlanders, and ſo were the more likely to manage things to purpoſe. The ſame day theſe noblemen, or any five of them, received full power to iſſue out proclamations and orders to purſue and puniſh delinquents, to apprehend and ſecure ſuſpected perſons, and to order ſuch bonds to be ſubſcribed as they ſhould think fit. In a word, they were inveſted with the authority of the privy-council, as their commiſſion fully bears. At the ſame time theſe commiſſioners received full and extenſive inſtructions too tedious to be here inſerted. I ſhall only obſerve, that by virtue thereof, they were to manage the army, and give orders to the country, to ſheriffs and other magiſtrates; nay, they, or any three of them, were veſted with a juſticiary power, and conſtituted a criminal court. But then the managers, to ſave themſelves, ordered this committee to free from quartering all the lands of counſellors, and ſuch as have ſubſcribed the bond, and obey the orders of the committee.

On the 21ſt of January the council met at Edinburgh, when a letter was read from duke Hamilton, wherein his grace excuſed himſelf from attending the committee by reaſon of his indiſpoſition. They, at the ſame time, ſent their orders to gentlemen of the ſhire of Lanerk, to meet at Hamilton, when required by the committee, and receive their orders.

Things being thus far ſettled, and the marquis of Athol; the earls of Mar, Moray, Caithneſs, Perth, Strathmore and Airly, having aſſembled what men they could raiſe from the Highlands, marched to Stirling where they were joined by the lord Linlithgow with the regular forces on the 24th of January. Theſe, with the Angus militia, and ſome gentlemen from Perthſhire, marched next day from Stirling, and were all at or about Glaſgow by the 26th.

The numbers were as follows: about 1000 foot of regular forces; the Angus militia and Perthſhire gentlemen 2200; Highlanders about 6000; horſe guards 160 beſides five other troops of horſe; together with the ſeveral retinues of the lords of the committee and others, with a vaſt number of ſtragglers, who came only for booty and plunder; ſo that, by a moderate computation, they may be reckoned to have been 10,000 in all. They had a large quantity of ammunition, four field-pieces, vaſt numbers of ſpades, ſhovels and mattocks, as if they had been to attack ſtrong fortifications. They had likewiſe good ſtore of iron ſhackles, as if they had been to carry back a parcel of ſlaves and thum-blocks, as they called them, for the examination and trial of ſuch as they ſhould ſee required it. The muſqueteers had their daggers ſo made, as, if need were, to faſten on the muzzles of their pieces for manling horſe, like our bayonets, not then brought to perfection. Such a formidable company could not but fill all the country with conſternation in a time of peace; nay, the very gentlemen and officers in the army itſelf, who were of any temper and reaſon, were ſurpriſed upon their entering into a country entirely peaceable, which had been repreſented, and they had expected it, to be all up in arms.

At Glaſgow the committee of council met, opened their inſtructions, and immediately ſet about diſarming the peaceable country, and preſſing the bond; and, on the 28th of January, the ſheriffs of Roxburgh, Stirling, Lanerk, Renfrew, Wigtoun and Dumfries ſhires, and the ſtewartry of Kirkcudbright, were before them, and received inſtructions and orders—to aſſemble all the heritors, liferenters, &c. in their reſpective ſhires, for ſubſcribing a bond which had been ſigned by the lords of the committee; of which a copy was given them—to oblige the leaders of the horſemen of the militia—troops to deliver up all the militia-arms, ſwords, piſtols, holſters, and all the heritors, and others in whoſe hands they were, to do the ſame;—to diſarm all other perſons, except privy counſellors, officers and ſoldiers in the king's pay, together with noblemen and gentlemen of quality, who were permitted to wear their ſwords only—to give the committee a liſt of theſe perſons of quality. In ſhort, the ſheriffs were ordered to diſarm their ſhires upon oath, and report their diligence by the ſeventh of February next. I ſhall not here give the reader a copy of this bond, becauſe it is almoſt verbatim the ſame with that ſent by the managers to the ſhires of Fife.

They who took the bond, being to receive protection, were obliged to ſubſcribe this additional clauſe: 'And I do farther hereby oblige me, that I ſhall not own any perſon's lands or goods, but ſuch as do properly belong to myſelf, under colour of the protection given to me, and that under ſuch pains and penalties as the council or committee of council ſhall impoſe, in caſe I contraveen.'

There were, about this time, many papers writ againſt this bond, and particularly theſe following things, among others, were urged. 1. That the council had no power to preſs it, or any other, without the authority of king and parliament; whereas they had no authority for this but the king's letter. 2. None of preſbyterian principles could take this bond, becauſe it obliged him to walk according to the law eſtabliſhing epiſcopacy, and to take that to be a rule which he judged unlawful; and ſo to act contrary to the dictates of his conſcience, which is not to be forced. 3. The bond obliged him, who ſigned it, to give no relief to, or have any converſation with outed vagrant miniſters, though ſometimes they might be great objects of charity and compaſſion. And if we are not to ſhut our bowels of pity againſt Turks and Pagans, when in miſery, how can we ſuffer them to be ſhut againſt Chriſtians? Are we not taught to do good to all, eſpecially the houſhold of faith? Whereas, when our relations are, what is called, vagrant miniſters, this bond obliges us to be unnatural. 4. The bond obliged to take and apprehend thoſe it ſpeaks of. But how unſuitable is it for gentlemen, and moſt of the king's free liege, to turn macers or meſſengers at arms? And who can be forced to that unleſs he pleaſe? We are only obliged to take traitors, or ſuch as are guilty of leſe-majeſty. 5. None can bind for more than himſelf, and conſequently whoever took this bond bound himſelf to an impoſſibility. For how can a nobleman or gentleman bind himſelf to that which all the king's forces could not do? If the council, or their committee, had required men to oblige themſelves to endeavour the conformity of others, there had been ſome colour of reaſon; but to bind men to be liable for other mens tranſgreſſions was without all precedent; and the law of God, in the cloſeſt relation that can be, expreſly ſays, That the ſon ſhall not die or ſuffer for the father's tranſgreſſions, much leſs the father for the ſon's, and, leaſt of all, the maſter for the tenant's.

Theſe are a few of the reaſons that were urged againſt this bond. The reader will remember, that, when the council found it expedient not to inſiſt upon preſſing a bond much like that we are now treating of, they gave this for a reaſon. That the law itſelf is the ſtrongeſt bond that can be exacted of any man. How unſteady muſt their councils have been, that, in about four months time, they ſhould preſs this bond ſo univerſally, and force it upon people by the dreadful motive of a ſtanding army and a Highland hoſt!

On the 29th of January the committee for public affairs was ordered by the council to remove ſome fanatic miniſters from the tolbooth of Edinburgh and the Canongate to the Baſs. My author takes notice, that this was the firſt time that he met with the epithet of fanatic miniſters in the regiſters.

The ſame day the committee commanded the earl of Caſſils, as bailie principal of Carrick, to receive from all perſons, in whoſe hands the militia arms were, all the ſaid arms, and to order all heritors, &c. to bring with them their tenants, cottars and ſervants, with their arms of all ſorts, to be delivered upon oath, to ſuch as the major-general ſhould appoint, in the preſence of his lordſhip or his deputes, declaring, That all who refuſed ſhould have ſoldiers quartered upon them; and to give an account of his diligence to the committee at Ayr on the 7th of February following; which was done accordingly. Mean while the Highland hoſt marched weſt, and by the 7th of February were dispersed all over Cuningham and Kyle, where they behaved as if they had been in an enemy's country. It is remarkable that they were let loose upon the shire of Ayr before the committee went along with them, or any offer of the bond was made to them.

On the seventh of February the committee sat down at Ayr; and, among the first things they did, they ordered the earl of Cassils to pull down the meeting-houses in Carrick. According to their orders the earl had delivered up all his arms, except his sword, and therefore desired that he might have the assistance of some soldiers in case of resistance: but this was refused, neither would they restore him any of his arms, which made him hesitate a little upon their unreasonable demands, till one of his friends, a member of the committee, whispered him in the ear, that there was but an hair-breadth between him and prison, and therefore he no longer declined their orders. However, some country people having notice of what passed, out of regard to his lordship, saved him the trouble, and pulled the meeting-houses down before he came.

The same day they received the report of the sheriffs appointed to be given in. The return from the sheriff of Dumfries and Nithsdale was voted satisfactory. Mr Ezekiel Montgomery, sheriff depute of Renfrew, reporting, That only two of the most insignificant gentlemen, and three burgesses, had taken the bond, the committee was displeased. But the report from the shire of Lanerk provoked them out of measure; for it seems, that of 2900 heritors and feuars, only nine of small interest of the former, and ten of the latter, had signed the bond. The duke of Hamilton, the lords Blantyre and Carmichael peremptorily refused it; and when, by force or fraud, some complied, their compliance cost them many bitter reflections.

In the more remote shires, some of the sheriffs pretending they had not received a copy of the bond, declined a report, and begged a new day for presenting the bond a second time, and renewing their inquiry for arms. This was granted; but when they were required to demand of every person upon oath, 'Whether he had any arms? or disposed of any since the first of January last? if gifted or sold? to whom? or if hid? and where?' These queries were extended to all the shires, nay, the officers of the Highlanders were, in some places, intrusted with this matter; so that by this means the whole country was rendered incapable of defending itself in case of any emergency.

Mean while the committee at Ayr published an act on the ninth of February commanding all the heritors and others to appear before them on the 18th, 19th, 20th and 21st, in order to take the bond. And accordingly notice was given them by the sheriffs-officers, and all the parishioners of Dundonald were summoned to meet in the church at the Kirktoun, and bring with them all the cottars, servants and arms of all sorts. The earl of Cassils, by virtue of an order from this committee, ordered their act to be published through the parishes within the bounds of his bailiary or jurisdiction. But, notwithstanding his complying with every thing, on the 10th of February 1500 men were sent upon free quarters into the jurisdiction of Carrick, 10 or 12 days before the gentlemen were to appear before the committee; and most of them were quartered upon the earl of Cassils estate, where they committed many insolences and cruelties, for which there was no remedy.

Mean time the reports made from several shires, convincing the council that it would be no easy matter to make the bond take, they went another way to work. Accordingly, on the 11th of February, they published a proclamation, discharging all heritors, liferenters and masters to receive tenants or servants without certificates that they had taken the bond; so that this bond became an universal test. The bond was annexed to the proclamation, and was signed at Edinburgh by the counsellors that same day, and ordered to be signed by the lords of session at their first meeting. The same 21th of February the committee at Ayr published a proclamation much to the same effect, discharging all persons from harbouring tenants or cottars who refused the bond, under the penalty of 600 l. Scots for each tenant.

On the 14th of February the council made an act for securing the public peace, as they termed it. '—That since every private subject may force such from whom they fear any harm, to secure them by lawborrows; and that it hath been the uncontroverted and legal practice of his majesty's privy council, to oblige such, whose peaceableness they justly suspected, to secure the peace for themselves, their wives, bairns, men, tenants and servants, under such penalties as they find suitable to their contempt, guilt or occasion upon which such sureties are sought; therefore the lords of the privy council, considering that his majesty hath declared his just suspicion of those who refuse or delay to take the said bond, and being themselves justly suspicious of their principles and practices who refuse the same, do ordain, that all such persons be obliged to enact themselves in the books of secret council, that they, their wives, bairns, &c. shall keep his majesty's peace; and particularly that they shall not go to field-conventicles, nor harbour or commune with rebels or persons intercommuned; and that they shall keep the persons, families and goods of their regular ministers harmless, and that under the double of every man's yearly valued rent, (if he have any) and of such other penalties as shall be thought convenient—if they have no valued rent, &c.

It is plain the managers were grievously vexed at the general refusing of the bond, not by the meaner sort only, but even by noblemen, gentlemen and several of the most eminent lawyers; the earls of Crawford, Calendar and Roxburgh, the viscount of Kilsyth, the lords Balmerino, Melvil and Newark, all stuck at it. Bishop Burnet says, 'That this put Lauderdale in such a frenzy, that, at the council table, he made bare his arms above his elbow, and swore by Jehovah he would make them enter into those bonds.' Therefore, to force a general compliance, they fell upon this new and unprecedented method of lawborrows *.

Now though such security be no ways unreasonable with respect to private persons; yet, that the king and government should require this of his subjects, and of the meanest of them, who refuse an unreasonable bond, seems most unaccountable, as it evidently discovers a jealousy between the sovereign and his subjects, and declares him to be in dread of them. I shall not trouble the reader with remarks on the preamble of this act, in which the presbyterians are charged with schism and rebellion. The same historian says, that 'these things seemed done on a design to force a rebellion which they thought soon would be quashed, and would give a good colour for keeping up an army; and that Lauderdale's party depended so much on this, that, in their hopes, they began to divide among themselves the confiscated estates: so that on Valentine's day, instead of drawing mistresses, they drew estates. And great joy appeared in their looks upon a false alarm that was brought them of an insurrection: and they were much dejected when they knew it was false.' Many thought it very surprising that such a series of oppression, injustice and cruelty, had not long before this stirred the people up to violent measures.

Jointly with this act the council sent farther instructions to their committee at Ayr, enjoining them to use their utmost endeavours to reduce the heritors and others to obedience who have not taken the bond,—to purse the said heritors and liferenters for all conventicles kept on their lands since the 24th of March 1674,—to command all sheriffs, bailies of regalities, and their deputes, to take the bond themselves, and, in case of refusal, to proceed against them;—to allow all heritors, who take the bond, to wear their swords, otherwise not, &c. And, as to the lawborrows, they were to insist for security from all who refused, according to the act. In short, it was ordered that the recusants should have an indictment given them and be prosecuted to the utmost.

While the committee was thus engaged, the militia and Highlanders were ravaging the country about Kyle, Carrick and Cuningham, without the least provocation on the part.

* The import of a lawborrows is, that, when two neighbours are at such variance, as that they dread bodily harm from one another, the party injured procures from the justiciary, (formerly from the council) or any other judges competent, letters charging the other to find caution or security that the complainer, his wife, children, servants, &c. but before such letters can be granted the complainer must give his oath that he dreads bodily harm, trouble or molestation from him against whom he complains.

part of the ſuffering people, and even the few heritors and tenants who took the bond ſuffered much the ſame with thoſe who refuſed it. And it is remarkable, that the poor oppreſſed people continued ſo peaceable, and ſo patiently bore the ſpoiling of their goods, and other outrages done to their perſons, that the managers had not ſo much as a falſe alarm, except once, when it was talked, without any foundation, that a number of people was aſſembled in arms about Fenwick muir; for, on the 18th of February, the council were told, that their committee, being informed of perſons in arms about Fenwick, had ſent out a party, but none appeared, neither could they find that there had been any in arms. The ſame day the council ordered the Highlanders to be diſmiſſed and ſent home, and appointed the militia of Mid-Lothian, Eaſt-Lothian, &c. to march towards Glaſgow in their room. I do not know but they might be aſhamed at the reports they received of their unprecedented ravages and oppreſſions.

On the 19th, and following days of February, many of the heritors of the ſhire of Ayr were before the committee; and the earl of Dumfries, Auchmannoch, and ſome of ſmall conſideration, together with the magiſtrates of the town of Ayr, took the bond; but the generality ſtood out; and theſe had an indictment and charge of lawborrows given them to anſwer in 24 hours before the committee. One gentleman peremptorily refuſing the bond, and being threatened with having the Highlanders ſent to his eſtate, told them, He had no anſwer to that argument, and could not help it; but, before he would comply with the lawborrows, he would go to priſon.

Next day the recuſants were called to anſwer to their indictment. Lord Cochran, being among the firſt that was called, complained of the ſhortneſs of the diet allotted them, begged more time, and the aſſiſtance of lawyers, ſince they were required to give their oath concerning a crime that might be found capital. When all were removed, the lords gave it as their judgment that the council's diets were peremptory, and behoved to be anſwered preſently; and that whatever the depoonents declared ſhould never infer capital puniſhment. When his lordſhip was called in, and had this intimated to him, he urged that, by act of council of the 5th of October laſt, all libels againſt conventicles were to be reſtricted to a month backwards, and none was bound to ſwear but for himſelf; and that they, who were ready to purge themſelves by oath as to their own guilt, were to have no bonds preſented to them. The advocate declared he knew of no ſuch act. Cochran referred the matter to the clerk's oath, but that was refuſed, and his lordſhip was told that he muſt either ſwear, or be reputed guilty. Whereupon he gave his oath, That he was free of conventicles, and all his ſervants to his knowlege. In the afternoon lord Catheart, Sir John Cochran and the laird of Ceſnock being called, refuſed the bond in the ſame manner that lord Cochran had done. And the laird of Kilbirnie particularly urged the above act of council, and offered to produce a copy of it, which was peremptorily refuſed; and, to prevent his taking inſtruments upon his offer, the earl of Caithneſs got the meeting to be ſuddenly adjourned. Others that came before them were threatened with exorbitant fines, double quartering, impriſonment, and the like, and were at length forced to anſwer their interrogatories: nay, ſuch was their unaccountable proceeding, that they preſented the bond to a young lord under age, and, becauſe he refuſed it, they treated him as the reſt. But, notwithſtanding theſe ſeverities, the earls of Caſſils and London, the lords Montgomery, Cochran, Catheart and Bargeny, with all the reſt of the gentlemen and heritors of Ayrſhire, and the town of Irvine, peremptorily refuſed; and therefore were all ordered to be declared rebels, and outlawed.

On the 21ſt Patrick Sheriff in Knows, and James Shiels in Boltoun, were fined for being at conventicles, and ordered to ly in priſon till they made payment.

This committee having ordered ſeveral gentlemen in Carrick to be impriſoned, they, upon the 22d of February, iſſued a proclamation, commanding all heritors and land lords, tenants and ſervants, who had not ſigned the bond, to part with all their horſes above the value of 50l. Scots, in a ſhort limited time, under the penalty of forfeiting the horſe, and paying 100 l. for each horſe above ſuch a value.

The ſame day the earl of Caſſils appeared, and, refuſing to ſubſcribe the bond tendered to him, was therefore charged to appear next day before the lords of the committee, under the pain of rebellion, for being at conventicles, and other high crimes, and to give his oath upon the truth of his indictment. And though he appeared and cleared himſelf by oath, of all the crimes laid to his charge, yet, becauſe he refuſed to ſubſcribe the bond, the lords appointed a meſſenger to charge him with letters of lawborrows; and, in caſe of failure, to denounce him rebel within ſix days. Hereupon he wrote to their lordſhips, intreating a week's delay, which was refuſed him. Wherefore he immediately repaired to Edinburgh to attend the privy council, and offer them all poſſible ſatisfaction. But, upon his coming thither, a proclamation was iſſued, commanding all the weſt country noblemen, heritors, and others, to depart from Edinburgh, to their own houſes, within three days; before which time he was actually denounced rebel at the market-croſs of Ayr, and letters were ſent for apprehending his perſon. Wherefore his lordſhip found himſelf under a neceſſity to repair to London, in order to lay his caſe before his majeſty.

Mean while, on the 26th of February, the council had a letter from their committee, deſiring garriſons might be appointed upon the removal of the Highlanders, which was complied with. Next day the committee was ordered to intimate to the town of Irvine, that they muſt find perſons qualified to ſerve in the magiſtracy, who are willing to take the allegiance, declaration, and ſign the bond, or elſe loſe their privileges. And the ſame day the council impowered the magiſtrates of Glaſgow to tear the burgeſs tickets of all who refuſed the bond, and to turn all recuſants out of their council. On the laſt of February the council recommended to their committee not to burden any who ſigned the bond with proviſion for the garriſons.

The reader muſt be informed, that the garriſons were occaſioned by a letter, wrote by the conform clergy in the weſt to the archbiſhop of Glaſgow, wherein they ſignified, that they might abandon their charges as ſoon as the Highlanders left the country, if garriſons were not appointed. How far it was their duty, and how agreeable to that ſacred function which they pretended to bear, to have any hand in ſuch proceedings, let the world judge. It is true, my author did not ſee that letter, but he has publiſhed a letter from the preſbytery of Ayr to the ſaid archbiſhop, which ſufficiently confirms the fact. Wodrow, Vol. I. p. 479.

At laſt the committee, about the end of February, ordered the Highlanders home. They were now convinced that there was no forcing the bond upon the weſt country; neither did they riſe in arms, as was expected, but bore all their oppreſſions with incredible patience. The Highlanders therefore, having waſted the country, marched off, except 500, who, with the Angus militia and ſtanding forces, continued till the end of April, when orders came to diſmiſs them alſo. When they returned, they took along with them a great many horſes, and vaſt quantities of goods out of the merchants ſhops; together with pots, pans, all ſorts of wearing apparel, bed-clothes, and ſome plate bearing the names and arms of gentlemen. Nay, two of their colonels, Airly and Strathmore, were ſaid to have ſent home great ſums of money, more than they poſſibly could have got by their pay. And this is not to be wondered at, ſince from one country pariſh it was calculated they had got about 1000 l. ſterling. Upon their march homeward they took free quarters without reſtraint, except now and then that the country people would attack the ſtragglers, and retake ſome of their own goods. And Mr Wodrow tells us, that the ſtudents in the college of Glaſgow, and other youths, oppoſed 2000 of them at the bridge of Glaſgow, and would not permit them to paſs till they had delivered the ſpoil, and then only by forty at a time, who were conveyed through the weſt port, without being ſuffered to go through the town; that the cuſtom houſe there was almoſt filled with pots, pans, bed clothes, wearing apparel, and the like. A particular account of all the depredations and ravages of this lawleſs Highland hoſt would fill a volume; and they behaved with greater inſolence and cruelty than a foreign enemy would have done; for, not content with free quarters, though that was moſt illegal, they openly robbed both on the high-way and in houſes, and every where took, from the country people, pots, pans, wearing apparel, and every thing they could lay their hands on; and whoever made any reſiſtance, were knocked down and wounded. In ſome places they tortured people, by ſcorching their bodies at large fires, and other ways, till they diſcovered where their money and goods were concealed. They killed their cattle, and drove away their horſes; and, as if poſſeſſed of the authority of king and parliament, they impoſed taxes on ſeveral places, threatening to burn their houſes if they were denied. The meaneſt ſtraggler exacted his ſixpence a day, and the modelled forces their ſhilling, or merk Scots. Nay, they openly offered to commit rapes; ſo that it is proper even to draw a veil over their unnatural and horrid wickedneſs committed up and down the country. In ſhort, it is hard to ſay which is moſt to be admired, the conduct of perſons of honour and quality, in being acceſſory to and encouraging of ſuch things, or the patience of an oppreſſed people in bearing their ſufferings without reſiſtance; for my author ſays, That, unleſs in the pariſh of Campſie, where one of the Highlanders was killed, he had not found that reſiſtance was made any where.

It is true, though the greateſt part of the committee were furious promoters of thoſe oppreſſions, yet there were two or three of a more moderate diſpoſition; but theſe were out-voted. The marquis of Athol was particularly taken notice of for his clemency, and the earl of Perth for his equity. However, this moderate party prevailed at laſt ſo far as to get the Highlanders removed.

I ſhall conclude this chapter with ſome farther particular inſtances of the loſs and hardſhips ſuſtained on this occaſion, eſpecially in the ſhire of Ayr. The noblemen and gentlemen of that ſhire made ſome calculation of loſſes, in a paper which they drew up, in order to lay them, if need were, before his majeſty. Mr Wodrow has given it at large. However, the following abridgment of it is ſufficient for my purpoſe.

An account of the loſſes the following pariſhes ſuſtained by quartering, robbing, and ſpoiling of the ſoldiers and Highland hoſt.

It would be endleſs to mention the loſſes of particular perſons; however I cannot omit ſome inſtances. When this dreadful hoſt came to the ſhire of Ayr, the curate of Kirkoſwald procured a regiment for that pariſh; and ſuch was his ghoſtly care for his flock, that, by his direction, quarters were given for theſe plunderers. The ſmall pariſh of Dalmellingtoun, where one Quintin Dick had his reſidence, had 900 of them upon it.

The heritors who took the bond, and their lands, were free from quartering and exactions as far as thoſe Highland robbers could be reſtrained; but others had no mercy. Sir William Cuningham of Cuninghamhead, though but a ſchool boy, had the laird of Dun's whole troop quartered upon his eſtate; ſo that his tenants were grievouſly oppreſſed, and the victual that was laid up in the tower of Cuninghamhead was rendered uſeleſs by their treading it under their feet, to the great prejudice of the innocent minor. And all this under the direction of — Dunbar of Grange, nephew to Dun, and a cornet in his troop. This Dunbar forced his landlord, David Muir, to give him what money he had, threatening otherwiſe to hang him in his own barn; which he and his ſervants would have done, had they not been prevented by a number of women.

The town of Kilmarnock ſuffered extremely at this time. John Borland on the bridge loſt 100 l. Scots. William Taylor merchant had a whole company of them quartered for one night beſides his quota. Matthew Hopkins loſt 500 merks. William Dickie merchant had nine of them upon him for about ſix weeks; and when they were off they robbed his houſe, carried off a ſtocking full of ſilver money, broke two ribs of his ſide, and ſo frighted his wife, then big with child, that ſhe died ſoon after. This good man loſt upwards of 1000 merks. Hugh Mowat, James Stewart, and his ſon, and James Aird, with many others, were dreadfully oppreſſed. In a word, before they left Kilmarnock, they reſolved, on the Sabbath-day, to plunder the town, as ſeveral houſes felt to their coſt. When Mr Alexander Wedderburn, indulged miniſter there, was interceding for the place, a Highlander puſhed him ſo ſeverely on the breaſt, with the butt-end of his muſket, as proved the occaſion of his death.

The pariſh of Evandale in Lanerk ſhire loſt 1700 l. 12 s. Scots. The ſmall pariſh of Cambuſlang, in the ſame ſhire, likewiſe ſuffered much; particularly John Crofbie, David Donald, James Jackſon, William Kerr and Thomas Robertſon. The lady of Sir Patrick Houſtoun was by their inſolent rudeneſs frighted to death.

From theſe few hints the reader may form a judgment of the diſmal ſtate of the country during the time of the Highland hoſt, and what a ſenſible pleaſure it muſt have given all ranks to ſee them marching back to their own mountains. But ſtill the meaſures of oppreſſion were carried on as I am to relate.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the proceedings of the council and their committee after the return of the Highland hoſt: the appointment of garriſons: the convention of eſtates: the riſe: the progreſs of the perſecution, and other things to the end of the year 1678.

THE damages done by the Highland hoſt were ſo great, that the managers were pleaſed to diſmiſs them; but ſtill they continued to purſue the non-conformiſts with rigour and ſeverity. Accordingly, on the firſt of March, a letter from the committee was read in council, ſignifying that they had charged all who had not taken the bond with lawborrows, and had ſent their names to the council, in order to their being declared rebels; but that the noblemen and gentlemen charged had left their own houſes, and come in to Edinburgh; ſo that the principal perſons concerned cannot be apprehended. All the heritors in Renfrew and Lanerk were thus charged.

The ſame day Mr Robert Anderſon was before the council for non-conformity; but he was releaſed upon giving bond to appear when called. But though the lord Cochran, the laird of Kilbirnie, and others, offered a petition for the ſuſpenſion of the laborrows, yet the council ſignified to their committee, that they would receive no petitions from the gentlemen come to Edinburgh, and that they had commanded them by proclamation to remove.

Mean while the committee at Ayr, paſſed an act on the fourth of March, appointing garriſons in the following places, viz. in the houſe of Blairquhan in Carrick, of 100 foot and 20 horſe; in Barſkimming and Ceſnock, of 50 foot and 10 horſe each; and ordering the commiſſioners of ſupply to meet on the 7th, to provide neceſſaries for them, them, and give an account of their diligence on the 8th.

But, before theſe things could be done, the council, on the 6th of March, ſent a letter to his majeſty, giving him an account of the proceedings of this committee with reſpect to the bond, &c. and throwing the moſt falſe and inſidious reflections on the non-conformiſts, in order to have their iniquous conduct authoriſed by the king; for they intimate, that all things were done in purſuance of his orders in his letter of the 11th of December laſt. But, as biſhop Burnet very well obſerves 'when very illegal things were to be done, the common method was, that a letter was drawn for it to be ſigned by the king, directing it upon ſome colour of law or antient practice, and he readily ſigned whatever was ſent to him.—

Next day Henry Muir, commiſſary clerk at Kirkcudbright, was charged before the council for being at conventicles in September or October laſt, and of correſponding with Meſſ. Welſh, Semple, Arnot, &c. He owned he once heard Mr Arnot at a field conventicle; yet, by the intereſt of the biſhop of Galloway, he was diſmiſſed without any farther trouble. We ſhall hear that one James Learmont was executed for being only preſent at a field conventicle; but he had not a biſhop to intercede for him.

It does not appear that the committee met on the 8th; but on the ninth, they made another act, ordering the clerks of the commiſſioners of ſupply to ſummon the ſaid commiſſioners to meet at Ayr on the 12th, both for providing the neceſſaries for the garriſons, and ſettling the prices they were to pay for their proviſions; and that, if they fail in their duty in this reſpect, the officers and ſoldiers ſhall have liberty to take theſe neceſſaries from the next adjacent places, with the rates to be fixed by the committee, except the lands of privy counſellors, and thoſe employed in his majeſty's ſervice, or ſuch as have taken or ſhall take the bond. But the commiſſioners of ſupply having moſt of them refuſed the bond, and not chuſing to give any actual concurrence with the impoſition of garriſons in time of peace, did not meet on the day appointed; and therefore the committee, on the 12th of March, fixed the prices on hay, ſtraw, oats, &c. whereupon the officers of the army brought in what they wanted from the adjacent places, and called the heritors of every pariſh, near their garriſon, to meet in order to fix the proportion of each pariſh for furniſhing the garriſon with neceſſaries, all proteſted perſons being free.

On the 13th the council publiſhed their proclamation, ordering the bond to be ſubſcribed by all the heritors in the ſhires of Edinburgh, Haddington, Linlithgow, Berwick, Peebles, and Selkirk; and next day they gave orders to charge the recuſants with lawborrows, as had been done in the weſt. But though the bond was ſubſcribed in ſeveral ſhires, yet the heritors were generally backward, particularly in Eaſt-Lothian, where, from among upwards of 1000 heritors, not above 50 or 60 ſigned it; and by this time conventicles began again to be much frequented.

On the 15th a decreet was paſſed, at the inſtance of the king's advocate, againſt Patrick Thomſon in Kinloch, George Fleming in Balberty, Alexander Hamilton of Kinhil and his ſervant, — Henderſon. Robert Hamilton brother to the laird of Preſtoun, John Balfour of Kinloch, James Ruſſel ſenar of Kettle, James and John Reids there, John Balfour tenant to Lundy, Alexander Balfour there, John Archer in Strathmiglo, John Adam bailie there, and about 20 more, who, they ſaid, had met at the houſe of Balfour of Kinloch, with others, to the number of 60 or 80 armed men, with an intent to have murdered captain William Carſtairs, and —— Garret his ſervant, when the captain required them to deliver up—an intercommuned preacher, and to have fired 12 or 14 ſhot, whereby Garret was mortally wounded, and died on the ſpot.

It is ſufficient to obſerve, that few of thoſe here named were preſent at the time when that affair happened, particularly John Archer and others. There was no preacher among them; neither was Garret killed on the ſpot, as they repreſented: but it was neceſſary that things ſhould be aggravated. And indeed nothing was more common than for the letters, proclamations, acts of council, &c. to have their preambles or narratives filled with the groſſeſt lies and miſrepreſentations. All theſe perſons were outlawed, except two or three mean country people who appeared.

The ſame day a letter from the committee in the weſt was read in the council, deſiring that the heritors who refuſed the bond might be ſtopt from repairing either to the borders, or into Ireland, to avoid being apprehended. Accordingly, next day, a draught of proclamation was ſent to the committee, diſcharging all perſons to go to Ireland without paſſes; and requiring them at the ſame time to ſend in liſts of all who were charged with lawborrows, and ordered the ſhire of Dumbarton to take the bond at Glaſgow, where it ſeems the committee ſat for the reſt of their time.

Theſe proceedings were ſo illegal and ſubverſive of the liberties of the ſubjects, that about the end of this month duke Hamilton, the earls of Roxburgh and Haddington, lieutenant-general Drummond, and ſeveral other gentlemen of figure in the weſt and ſouth, thought it neceſſary to repair to court, in order to lay the ſtate of the nation before his majeſty. Nay, even Athol and Perth, who had been officers in the army that invaded the weſt, went along with them; for obſerving the peaceable carriage of the preſbyterians, and converſing with noblemen and gentlemen of good ſenſe, they were determined not to be any more active in the ſeverities uſed againſt them. The earl of Caſſils had been up ſome time before, and it ſeems that, by means of the duke of Monmouth, he got acceſs to his majeſty.

The managers at Edinburgh pretended to ridicule theſe noblemen, and aſſured their friends, that ſince they had not firſt laid their grievances before the council, the king would pay no regard to them. However, their going off without aſking leave was as ſurpriſing as it was unexpected, eſpecially their being joined by the marquis of Athol and the earl of Perth. The biſhop of Galloway made a heavy complaint of the conduct of thoſe two noblemen in a letter to the lord regiſter.

It is ſaid, that when theſe two noblemen, with their ſervants and other gentlemen, were on the road in Annandale, they loſt their way, and, it being late, were obliged to put up in a cottage in that country. The people having ſome knowlege of their errand, treated them with abundance of civility; and when their lordſhips, who could not get their horſes within doors, expreſſed their concern leſt they ſhould be ſtolen, having heard that Annandale was noted for horſe ſtealing, the country people told them they were in no hazard, for there was no thieving among them now, ſince the field preachings came into that country; and talked of many other branches of reformation brought about by means of Mr Welſh and other preachers.

As ſoon as the council got notice of the departure of duke Hamilton, on the 26th of March, they ſent up the earl of Moray and the lord Collingtoun, in order to vindicate their proceedings, and thoſe of their committee, againſt what might be objected by the noblemen and others who were gone to court.

The ſame day a letter from their committee was read in the council, ſignifying that the bond had been offered in the ſhire of Stirling, and that in the pariſh of Campſie, ſix miles north of Glaſgow, ſome hundreds aſſembled in arms, and killed one of the ſoldiers, and deſired an order to proceed againſt the heritors of that pariſh, for building a dwelling-houſe and meeting-houſe to one Mr Law, (after the revolution one of the miniſters in Edinburgh) adding, that the country about Glaſgow was much infeſted with unlicenſed chaplains, and deſiring that ſome perſons might be made examples of.

The earl of Caſſils gave in his caſe to his majeſty upon the 28th of March, containing a particular account of all that has been related concerning his lordſhip, ſubſcribed with his own hand; but, as ſoon as it was given to the king, a copy of it was ſent down by an expreſs to the council, atteſted by J. Foreſter ſecretary to the duke of Lauderdale.

Next day Mr Robert Wylie, governor to Francis lord Semple, a youth then at the univerſity, was ſummoned to appear before the committee of the council, but he did not; and his pupil withdrawing got a charge of lawborrows. And, on the 1ſt of April, the council had a letter from from their committee in the weſt, ſignifying that they had ſummoned before them lord Semple's governor and lord Cochran's chaplain, for officiating without a licence from the biſhop, and intended to proſecute thoſe who entertained them. And the ſame day the council received his majeſty's letter approving their conduct, and the proceedings of their committee, and thanking them for their careful proſecution of what he had recommended to them in his letter of the 11th of December laſt. However this did not diſcourage the patriots, who were gone up to London, from laying before his majeſty the injuſtice of ſeveral things he had approved of, as ſhall be related in its proper place.

On the 3d of April the council, taking under their conſideration thoſe commiſſioners of ſupply who did not aſſemble for ſettling the proviſions for garriſons, ordered the earls of Caſſils and Loudon, the lords Cochran, Cathcart, Bargeny, Sir William Muir of Rowallan, &c. to be called before them; but they did not appear: ſo this affair came to nothing.

The ſame day the copy of the earl of Caſſil's caſe was produced in council, and Mr Patrick Anderſon was ordered to be ſent to the Baſs, unleſs he preſently gave ſecurity, under the penalty of 2000 merks, to leave Edinburgh and five miles round it, and converſe with none but thoſe of his own family. This was hard treatment for alledged keeping of conventicles at his own houſe, and correſponding with Meſſ. Welſh, Williamſon, &c.

Next day they agreed upon a letter to be ſent to his majeſty, wherein they ſay.—'Whereas the earl repreſents, that we granted commiſſions to the marquis of Athol, and others, to take free quarters — we humbly conceive that your majeſty had juſt reaſon to look on his juriſdiction of Carrick, and ſome other weſtern ſhires, as in a ſtate of rebellion, ſince field-conventicles are by your laws declared to be rendezvouzes of rebellion; and that theſe were ſo increaſing, that there were far more armed men aſſembled in them almoſt weekly, than could be repreſſed by almoſt thrice the number of your ſtanding forces.—But yet our orders are falſely repreſented; for we only gave orders to take free quarters as your council and committee ſhould order; and that your council has given orders is denied; — yet, to the end that none ſhould ſuffer but ſuch as ſhould continue guilty, it was offered by your council, that only ſuch as ſhould refuſe to ſecure the peace ſhould be quartered upon; and accordingly protections were granted to all ſuch as ſecured the peace.—Whereas it is repreſented, that a bond was preſſed without law, it is humbly aſſerted, that the bond was only offered, but not preſſed.—And as to the legal ſecurity by lawborrows, it is expreſsly warranted by the 129th act, parl. 9. James I. And univerſal lawborrows are warranted by act 13. parl. 6. James II.—Upon which account it is humbly craved, from your majeſty's juſtice, that the earl of Caſſils, who hath contemned your proclamation, and charged your privy-council with crimes of ſo high a nature, may be ſent down priſoner, to be tried and judged according to law.'

This is but a very ſhort abſtract of the letter, which the reader will find at large in Wodrow, p. 501, &c. who juſtly obſerves, that there was as little rebellion at field conventicles as in churches. It was the council who firſt called them rendezvouzes of rebellion, and from this inferred that the weſt-country was in a ſtate of rebellion; how juſtly muſt be left with the reader. Beſides, it is abſolutely falſe that there were weekly more armed men at theſe conventicles than thrice the number of the king's forces could ſuppreſs. That ſome had attended theſe meetings in arms is not denied; neceſſity obliged them to defend themſelves againſt the wicked aſſaults of the ſoldiers. They tell his majeſty that his council did not give orders for free quarters. But what a ſhift was this, when the committee did it by their authority? And it is falſe that free quarters were only taken from the refuſers of the bond, when it is well known that the Highlanders came ſeveral days before the time of taking the bond; and free quarters were allowed on the lands of Cuninghamhead, ann others, who could not be reckoned refuſers. In a word, it may make the reader ſmile to hear them ſaying the bond was offered, but not preſſed. If the ſending in of an army, the charging with lawborrows, and putting to the horn, was not preſſing, then nothing can be called ſo.

With the above letter the committee ſent up to the king an information of their proceedings with the earl of Caſſils; and about this time the managers thought it neceſſary to publiſh a paper, intitled, 'A true narrative of the proceedings of his majeſty's privy council in Scotland for ſecuring the peace of that kingdom in the year 1678.' Remarks were made upon this narrative, in a letter to a friend, which abundantly expoſed what was aſſerted therein.

On the 6th of April the council ordered Mr Alexander Roſs, a miniſter in the north, who had been detained priſoner in the tolbooth of Edinburgh for the ſpace of four months, without laying any thing to his charge, to be releaſed, upon giving ſecurity to live peaceably. And being informed, on the 10th, that many in the ſhire of Lanerk had not ſurrendered their arms, they ordered their committee to do all they could to diſarm them, who accordingly did their utmoſt; but many choſe rather to run all hazards than to come and deliver their arms upon oath.

On the 13th the committee at Glaſgow, conſidering that Mr Wylie and lord Semple had both withdrawn, wrote to the earl of Dundonald, one of his lordſhip's tutors, to do all he could to get him to return to the univerſity; and, on the 16th, lord Semple's mother, a profeſſed papiſt, petitioned the council that they would either recommend the care of her ſon's education to ſuch perſons as ſhall be anſwerable to their lordſhips, or take ſome proper meaſures for ſecuring to him his ſmall fortune during his minority, and himſelf in ſuch principles as were moſt ſuitable to his majeſty government, and might engage him in loyalty to the king and his ſucceſſors. The council upon this injoined the biſhop of Argyll and lord Roſs to appoint ſome perſons of ſound principles and loyalty to be tutor to the petitioner's ſon.

On the 19th an expreſs arrived, and the council ſat down at eight in the morning, when a letter was read from his majeſty, ſignifying that he had conſidered the repreſentations made by ſome of his ſubjects relating to the methods lately taken with the weſt country, and that he was reſolved to hear things more fully, and in the mean time commanded that the bond and lawborrows ſhould be ſuſpended till his farther pleaſure; and that all his forces, except his own guards, be immediately diſbanded. This ſurprized the managers, who were expecting the earl of Caſſils to be ſent down priſoner; and therefore they diſpatched Sir George MacKenzie to London, by whom they wrote to the earl of Moray, and lord Collingtoun, ſignifying their readineſs to obey his majeſty's commands, and reflecting on thoſe noblemen and others that had gone to court at this time, as if they had done all they could to ſhake the foundations of authority, to ſuch a degree as it will be paſt remedy, if not ſpeedily and vigorouſly adverted to by his majeſty; and therefore they begged them to concur with the advocate in repreſenting things to the king.

But, on the 22d, Sir John Cuningham went up himſelf to London; and though he and Sir George Lockhart, who had gone before him, had neither of them refuſed the bond, yet they were clear to give it as their judgment, that the impoſing of it and the lawborrows was contrary to law; and the ſentiments of ſuch eminent lawyers could not but have weight.

However diſſatisfying the king's laſt orders were, yet the Blue coat and the Nithſdale regiments, who were got as far as Lanerk, were diſbanded. Lord Haltoun went to the committee at Glaſgow, and gave them the firſt information of this ſudden change; but, at the ſame time, aſſured them of the king's favour, and that he would approve of their proceedings, though his affairs in England made it neceſſary to diſband the forces, and ſuſpend the bond for a little while. And, on the 24th, the council wrote to their committee, that, ſince diſorders by numerous field conventicles in Fife, Merſe, Teviotdale and Linlithgow were come to ſuch a height, and matters of moment were to be deliberated upon on the firſt of May, therefore they deſired them, as their buſineſs in the weſt was finiſhed, to come in to Edinburgh. What theſe matters of importance were, which which the council were to have before them, I know not; poſſibly they were to concert upon proper methods for ſuppreſſing what they called the increaſing of diſorders by numerous field conventicles, and for this end to have a ſtanding army, notwithſtanding the late orders for diſbanding the forces; and no doubt they took care to repreſent things in their own way to the king.

Mean while, on the fifth of May, there was a large field-meeting on the hills of Whitekirk over againſt the Baſs. A party of about 40 ſoldiers and 20 country people whom they preſſed to go along with them, commanded by enſign Charles Maitland, being ſent by the governor, came upon them. The people reſolved to keep together, and not offer any violence unleſs they were attacked. The party advanced, and commanded them in the king's name to diſperſe. Some who were near them anſwered, that, though they honoured the king, yet they were reſolved to hear the word of God. Upon this a ſoldier giving a blow to one of the people, an able-bodied countryman knocked him down. Being thus engaged, the people on that ſide of the meeting quickly ſurrounded and diſarmed the ſoldiers, and ſent them off. No harm was done to any of them, farther than that one was killed on the ſpot. Two of the meeting were taken that day, and ſeveral others afterwards, among whom were James and Geo. Learmonths, William Temple, Rob. Hepburn in eaſt-Saxton, and Will. Bryſon younger in Dumbar. The firſt of theſe were executed in September, as ſhall be related.

Though, on the 10th of May, the council recalled the garriſon at Ayr, yet on the 14th they had a letter from the king, dated the ſeventh, declaring, That, conſidering the ſhounding of field-conventicles, theſe rendezvouzes of rebellion he thought fit that ſome more forces ſhould be raiſed, and that he expected a ſpeedy and exact account of what number and quality of troops would be neceſſary. —How fluctuating were his majeſty's councils! the one day to order the forces to be diſbanded, and the next, in a manner, to order a new levy to be made. However, this letter was what the managers wanted. And the ſame day, in their return, they took notice of the growth of conventicles, and that the raiſing of new forces was the beſt way to ſuppreſs them; and therefore they propoſed two troops of horſe, each conſiſting of 100 men; and, as the ſupport of theſe neceſſarily called for money, that a convention of eſtates ſhould be ſummoned to provide it. But before theſe things could be brought about ſeveral occurrences happened.

Accordingly on the ſaid 14th of May, the council were informed of a conventicle at the houſe of Williamwood, where the meeting was diſperſed, and upwards of 70 men were taken priſoners by the dragoons who purſued the common people. The miniſters happily eſcaped. About 34 Glaſgow people, and as many countrymen were carried priſoners to Glaſgow, where they were examined by lord Roſs and others. The bond was offered to them, and the few that complied were releaſed; but the reſt after ſome days impriſonment, were ſent to Edinburgh under a ſtrong guard, where we ſhall leave them till we ſee what paſſed between the king and thoſe who in March laſt had gone to court. Many of them after long attendance, came away.

But at laſt, on the 25th of May, duke Hamilton, lord Cochran, Sir John Cochran, and lieutenant-general Drummond, were commanded to attend upon his majeſty at four o'clock. When they appeared, the king being accompanied with the duke of York and Monmouth, and the treaſurer, firſt aſked why they had come to him contrary to his proclamation? The duke of Hamilton who ſpoke firſt intreated his majeſty to let him know why he had laid him under marks of his diſpleaſure, viz. his being turned out of his council, and, ſince ever he came to London, not having had the honour of kiſſing his majeſty's hand. The king replied, He would firſt know the grounds of their complaints before he returned an anſwer. The duke ſaid, That he had his majeſty's encouragement to come, ſince he told them, when laſt at court, that, when he was any way wronged, he ſhould come to himſelf and make it known. Upon this they gave his majeſty a particular account of the invaſion of the Highlanders, their quartering and plunders, &c. the bond, the lawborrows, their being denounced and forbid by proclamation to lay their condition before the king. To which the king anſwered, That theſe were horrid things, and deſired they would ſet them down in paper. The treaſurer ſaid, that whatever was in theſe free quarterings, and in the reſt, they might have been prevented by taking the bond, which he conceived there was law for, there being two alternatives in it, either to deliver their tenants priſoners, or turn them out of their farms. To this it was replied, That there was no obliging maſters to apprehend their tenants; the fartheſt the act of parliament 1670 went, was to oblige maſters for their families and ſervants. 2. The maſters could not be obliged to turn tenants out of their lands, in regard the puniſhment for going to a conventicle was by law appointed to be a fine, which was not ſo grievous as turning them out of their poſſeſſions. Beſides, they urged that moſt of the tenants had leaſes, by virtue of which they had a legal right to their poſſeſſions, and could not be turned out for a crime that was only fineable by law. This conference held two hours, and much was ſaid by both parties. The king, in the concluſion, told them, That he could not judge of what they had ſaid unleſs they would give it under their hands, that he might lay it before his council. They anſwered, that they came to his majeſty to inform him of the wrongs and oppreſſions of the country, and not to accuſe the council, which they knew was dangerous, unleſs his majeſty would indemnify them; which the king refuſing, They ſaid they left the matter with him to do in it as he thought proper. In a word, though ſometimes the king ſeemed to be moved, yet, being ſtill under the influence of Lauderdale, he gave them no redreſs. So far from it, that on the 28th of May, three days after this conference, he wrote to the council, approving of their whole conduct, and recommending to them to take all ſuch legal courſes as they ſhould find neceſſary for preſerving the authority of the ſtate, and ſecuring the government of the church as by law eſtabliſhed.

The ſame Day John Bowie, James, John and Robert Maxwells, Dav. Corſbie, Will. Niven, Will. Urie, Jam. Lickpervick, Jam. Blackwood, Rob. Reid, Dav. Ferguſon, Will. Steven, Dav. Gray, Arch. Haddoway, Mungo Cochran, Rob. Hay, and many others, being called before the council, to give their oath who preached at the above conventicle at Williamwood, and refuſing, were ſentenced to be tranſported to the plantations, and to ly in priſon till a ſhip was got ready.

At the ſame time a letter was read appointing Lauderdale commiſſioner, and a proclamation was publiſhed for calling a convention of eſtates to meet at Edinburgh on the 20th of June next. In this proclamation the kingdom is repreſented to be in danger from thoſe execrable field-conventicles, the rendezvouzes of rebellion; and therefore, in order to ſuppreſs them, this convention was called to raiſe and provide for more forces.

Theſe conventicles got a new epithet. They were formerly called ſeditious, and rendezvouzes of rebellion, but now they are called execrable. But it was well known that theſe meetings had much of the divine preſence among them; and, as one obſerves, many were really converted, more were convinced, and generally all who attended them were reformed from their former immoralities. Beſides we have related that the occaſion of theſe meetings was owing to the execrable proceedings of the managers of that time. Neither is it any wonder though ſome were obliged to attend them in arms, when we conſider the ſanguinary laws that were made againſt them, and how they were expoſed to the illegal aſſaults of the ſoldiers. For a long time they met without any arms, and were frequently diſturbed and diſperſed. Some were killed, others were wounded, which they patiently endured without reſiſtance. At laſt ſeveral miniſters had a price ſet upon their heads, and many were outlawed; and therefore, finding that they thus were appointed as ſheep for the ſlaughter, they looked upon it as their duty to provide for their neceſſary defence. We have related how they were debarred all manner of liberty to worſhip God in public, and on the ſevereſt penalties forbid to aſſemble either in the churches or in private families. But, being perſuaded that it was their their duty not to forſake the aſſembling of themſelves together, they therefore took to the fields.

On the 13th of June, about 16 more who had been at Williamwood conventicle, were ſentenced to be tranſported. They were given to Ralph Williamſon of London to diſpoſe of them, to ſell them to the beſt advantage; and they were to ly in priſon till they could be ſhipped off. On the 20th, George Hume of Kimmergham and Jane Hume lady Ayton, having been impriſoned for a clandeſtine marriage, (I ſuppoſe for being married by a preſbyterian miniſter) were releaſed on paying 1000 merks fine, and 750 merks for pious uſes.

On the 26th the convention of eſtates met according to appointment, Parliaments now could not be ventured upon, leſt an inquiry ſhould be made into the ſtate of the nation, and propoſals made for redreſſing grievances. A convention anſwered the end of raiſing money, which was the chief thing now in view.

On the 10th of July they paſſed their act and offer of 1,800,000 l. Scots to be raiſed in the ſpace of five years, being 360 000 l. Scots yearly. In the preamble to this act they ſay, among other things, that it is not fit that this kingdom ſhould only, of all others, remain without defence, at a time wherein theſe dangerous field conventicles, declared by law rendezvouſes of rebellion, do ſtill grow in their numbers and inſolences, againſt all which the preſent forces cannot in reaſon be thought a ſuitable ſecurity.

The deſign of this aſſeſſment was to maintain an army for ſuppreſſing theſe conventicles, which were the butt of their malice: and now the biſhops had what they wanted; their friends were provided for in the army; the preſbyterians were divided among themſelves on account of the indulgence, and the impoſition of this ceſs increaſed their diviſions; and the rigorous execution of it, together with the cruel oppreſſions of this new army, occaſioned a riſing, which ſhall be related in the next volume.

Some looked upon it as unlawful to pay this ceſs, and others were of opinion, that, ſince violence was both expected and uſed, it was more adviſeable, by a piece of money, to preſerve themſelves and their families alive, and their ſubſtance from being taken from them, than, by an abſolute refuſal, to give an occaſion and afford a legal pretence to the cruelty of the collectors to deſtroy all. They added, that paying ceſs in theſe circumſtances, was not ſpontaneous, but conſtrained, and therefore the payers were to be excuſed, and looked upon as ſufferers rather than actors. There was a few others who paid this impoſition with a declaration, chuſing the middle way between paying it without any teſtimony againſt what was evil in it, and refuſing to pay it all. Among them was Quintin Dick of Dalmeliugtoun. The reaſons of his conduct I ſhall lay before the reader in his own words, as follow: '—After much liberty in pouring out my heart to God, I was brought to weigh that, as my paying of it might be by ſome, interpreted a ſcandal, and a ſinful acquieſcence in the magiſtrate's ſinful command; ſo, upon the other hand, my refuſing to pay it would be the greater ſcandal, being found to claſh againſt a known command of God, of 'giving to all their due; tribute to whom tribute is due, cuſtom to whom cuſtom; and knowing that Chriſt Jeſus, for that ſame very end, to evite offence, did both pay tribute himſelf, and commanded his followers to do it, I could ſee no way to refuſe payment of that ceſs, unleſs I had claſhed with that command of paying tribute to Ceſar. So, to evite the ſcandal of compliance on the one hand, and diſobedience to the magiſtrate, in matter of cuſtom, on the other, I came to a determination to give in my ceſs to the collector of the ſhire of Ayr, with a proteſtation againſt the magiſtrate's ſinful qualification of his commands, and a full adherence unto theſe meetings of God's people called conventicles, which in the act, he declared his deſign to bear down. I had no ſooner done this, but—it was ſaid, that my proteſtation was only to evite ſufferings, and could be of no weight, being proteſtatio contra in facto. But being perſuaded that it is the magiſtrate's right to impoſe and exact ceſs and cuſtom, I could have no clearneſs to ſtate my ſufferings in oppoſition to ſo expreſs a command of God. And as to the magiſtrate's ſinful qualification, having ſo openly declared and proteſted againſt it, I conceive the cenſure of this, to evite ſufferings is groundleſs, ſeeing that the enemy has ſubſcribed with my hand, before witneſſes a reſolute adherence to that which they ſay this leads to overthrow; and, if he mind to perſecute upon the ground of owning conventicles, he has a fair and full occaſion againſt me under my hand, &c.

Thus far he. But to do juſtice to thoſe who refuſed to pay this ceſs, I muſt briefly relate their ſentiments on this head. Thus they allowed, 1. That tribute and cuſtom are to be paid to the perſons ordained by God; but the impoſition of tyrants, enacted and exacted for promoting their wicked deſigns againſt religion and liberty, are no ways due; and therefore it is no equity to pay them. 2. It is lawful to pay them when due, either by law or contract, even though they ſhould afterwards be abuſed to pernicious ends; but theſe payments for ſuch wicked ends, either particularly ſpecified in the very act appointing them, or openly avouched by the exactions, are of another nature from impoſitions fundamentally appointed for the public good. 3. It is ſometimes lawful to pay them, even when illegally exacted, if afterwards they were, by dedition or voluntary engagement, legally ſubmitted to by the true repreſentatives: but not ſo when they were never either lawfully enacted or legally exacted, or voluntarily engaged by the repreſentatives, except ſuch as repreſent the enſlavement of the nation, and betrayal the country, religion, liberty, property, and all perſons intereſts, and declaredly impoſed to further the diſtruction of all. If it be objected, that Chriſt paid cuſtom lest he ſhould offend, and that the Jews wondered at his prudent anſwer, 'Render to Ceſar the things that are Ceſar's, and to God the things that are God's, it is ſufficient to obſerve that he taught them, in general, to give nothing to Ceſar in prejudice to that which is God's; and conſequently it muſt be unlawful to pay a tax that is appointed for ſuppreſſing the worſhip of God, where ever it is performed agreeable to his word. And to make the caſe parallel, it is no leſs than blaſphemy to ſay that Chriſt would have paid, or permitted his followers to pay a tax, profeſſedly impoſed for levying a war againſt himſelf, or baniſhing him and his diſciples out of the land, or to fill the mouths of the greedy phariſees; or that he would have paid, or ſuffered to pay their extortions, if they had been exacted of him or his diſciples, for his preaching or working miracles; or if help or hire had been demanded for the encouraging thoſe that ran to ſtone him for his good deeds. 4. It is lawful to pay a part to preſerve the whole, when it is extorted only by force and threatnings, and not exacted by law; when it is yielding only to a leſſer ſuffering, and not conſenting to a ſin to ſhift ſuffering; for though, no doubt, a man may give a robber a part to ſave his life, or preſerve the reſt, yet, if the robbers require not only a part for himſelf and his underlings, but demand it for this very end, that he may be in caſe to murder his father, mother, wife, children and friends, whom he has in his power; the queſtion is, Whether it would be lawful for any perſon to comply in theſe circumſtances? but the impoſers of the ceſs did not look upon themſelves as robbers, but claimed this exaction as a juſt debt; and that, for this declared purpoſe, to enable them to beat down the aſſemblies of Gods faithful people. 5. It is lawful paſſively, by forcible conſtraint, to ſubmit to the execution of ſuch wicked ſentences as impoſe thoſe burdens, if it be not by way of obedience to them; this is ſuffering and not ſinning. But it is unlawful to comply with the payment of a ceſs, when impoſed with an evident deſign to overthrow the work of God, and haraſs and proſecute his people. The duty, in that caſe, is to take joyfully the ſpoiling of our goods, and not to comply with ſinful demands. 6. It is lawful, of two evils of ſufferings, to chuſe the leaſt, when they are in our choice; but this is not the preſent caſe. It is true, there is this alternative, either to comply and pay the ceſs, or elſe to be expoſed to the rigorous oppreſſions of the laws then made. If the firſt could be done without ſin, then it doubtleſs might, to avoid the terrible conſeqnences of the laſt. But, as an active compliance with the former is ſinful, we are to chuſe ſuffering rather than ſin. When Chriſt was toſſed at ſea with his diſciples, had the Jewiſh rulers given peremptory orders to furniſh money for paying thoſe whom they they were to employ to ſink the ſhip, can it be imagined that any of the lovers of Jeſus would have complied with their demands? Now, has not Chriſt, and all the intereſt he hath in the nation, been embarked, as it were in one bottom? And have not the rulers ſent their peremptory orders to pay a ceſs for ſinking his floating intereſt? Can any who profeſs to love him comply with this? Can this compliance, eſpecially, be given into by thoſe, who, by ſolemn covenant, were obliged to maintain and defend it? Thus I have given a brief account of ſome of thoſe things ſaid in behalf of thoſe who refuſed this ceſs. The reader will find this point largely diſcuſſed in the Hind let looſe, from which I have taken theſe hints. I now go on to the ſubſequent occurences.

On the firſt of Auguſt, John Millar in Kirkaldy, David Barclay, Robert Murnoek, and ſeven or eight more, were brought before the council for having been at ſeveral field-conventicles. They refuſed to ſwear againſt any who were preſent with them, and ſo had a ſentence of tranſportation paſſed againſt them.

They likeways renewed their former act, requiring all concerned in the execution of the laws to take the oath of allegiance and declaration, and appointed their act to be printed and ſent to the members of inferior judicatures, town-council, and magiſtrates. It ſeems William Stirling, bailie depute of the regality of Glaſgow, had not exerted himſelf ſufficiently in ſuppreſſing conventicles; and therefore on the 14th of Auguſt, he was ordered to appear before the council, where he having alledged, that being newly veſted with that office, he was unacquainted with the methods of the court, the lords required him to be more diligent for the future, and ſo diſmiſſed him. The ſame day Sir James Stewart late provoſt of Edinburgh, who had, for ſome time, been priſoner in the caſtle, was, by reaſon of his old age and infirmities, ſet at liberty, upon giving a bond of 10,000 merks to appear when called. At the ſame time Thomas Kennedy of Grange, confeſſing that he had been at a conventicle laſt year, was fined in 800 merks, which he preſently paid, and was diſcharged.

Next day the council wrote two letters, the one to Dundonald to order Mr Wyllie to appear before them on the 11th of September, and provide a proper tutor for lord Semple; the other to the bailie of Montroſe, concerning a conventicle near that place, at which ſeveral attended in arms; but the matter was dropt. The ſame day the magiſtrates of Ayr were ordered to apprehend Mr John Cunningham, chamberlain to the laird of Enterkin, for harbouring Mr John Welſh.

About the end of this month a conſiderable number, both of the indulged and not indulged miniſters, met at Edinburgh, for compoſing the differences that had ariſen on account of the indulgence, which ſeveral had been touching againſt, and, as ſome apprehended, carried things to an exceſs in their ſermons. They had two probationers before them, but to little purpoſe; a third declined to converſe with them, or be ſubject to their admonitions.

We have related how diſſatisfactory the indulgence was to many, and how the acceptance of it offended numbers, becauſe it flowed entirely from the ſupremacy. On the ſeventh of October 1671, the Rev. Mr John Livingſton wrote a letter from Roterdam to his pariſhioners of Ancrum, in which he condemned thoſe who accepted the indulgence, without any public teſtimony either of their adherence to the oath of God, and Work of Reformation, or againſt the uſurpations of the civil magiſtrate upon the royal prerogative of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt: and among other things tells them, 'if any miniſters have had a hand in contriving or procuring that indulgence, I ſuppoſe they have done more miſchief to the church of Chriſt in that land [Scotland] than all the prelates and all their hirelings.' Beſides, the reader will obſerve, that theſe worthy perſons, who had not freedom to accept of the indulgence, were expoſed to the rage of the perſecutors, and deprived of all their liberties both civil and ſacred; and therefore, though they had expreſſed themſelves in their ſermons in terms that could not be altogether juſtified, had they not great provocation? And when they are convinced that the indulgence was injurious to Chriſt as head of the church, flowing from and depending upon the magiſtrate's ſupremacy; that it was inconſiſtent with preſbyterian principles; that it invaded the rights of the Chriſtian people, not only by depriving many of them of their own miniſters, but alſo obliging them to ſubmit to any the council ſhould ſend them; that by this eraſtianiſm was eſtabliſhed; were they to be condemned in preaching againſt it, nay, and in bearing their teſtimony againſt the accepters of it? I doubt not in the leaſt but many who accepted the indulgence were worthy and valuable perſons; but humanum eſt lubi, and it was certainly the duty of miniſters to concert meaſures for bringing about peace and union; but, at the ſame time, how they were to be condemned, who, for the ſake of union, could not renounce their principles, muſt be left with the reader. It is certain exceſſes of all kinds are to be avoided; but it is not to be wondered at, that, when the infection of apoſtacy did ſo univerſally prevail, ſome exceeded the bounds of moderation in ſhewing their zeal againſt it.

On the 11th of September, Patrick MacDougal, Mr James Laurie of French, Thomas Hay of Park, John Blair of Dunſkey, Andrew Agnew of Sheuchan, Alexander Veitch of Glen, William Veitch tenant to Glencranſtoun, and Adam Ruſſel late bailie of Peebles, were proſecuted for houſe and field conventicles. They who appeared were acquitted.

The ſame day Sir Patrick Hume of Polwart, in conſequence of a letter from the king, was ordered to be removed from the tolbooth of Edinburgh to the caſtle of Dumbarton. This gentleman had been impriſoned in September 1675, and was ordered to be releaſed in February 1676. If that order was complied with, it would ſeem he was again committed to priſon; for it is plain he was at this time in goal at Edinburgh.

Another letter from his majeſty was read in council, at the ſame time requiring them to raiſe two Highland companies, each conſiſting of 150 men, beſides officers, for putting a ſtop to the depredations in the Highlands, whether this order was complied with, my author did not find from the regiſters. The ſuppreſſing of conventicles took up moſt of their time; for at the ſame meeting they ordered the arms and papers of non-conformiſts to be ſearched for and ſeized. And next day ſoldiers were ſent to Coupar of Fife for executing whatever orders they ſhould receive from the council, or their committee, or the major general. They alſo enjoined the magiſtrates of Kirkcaldy to proceed againſt thoſe that had left their pariſh church to frequent conventicles, and thanked the magiſtrates of Dundee for their care in this reſpect. They likewiſe wrote to the marquis of Douglas, deſiring him to preſent John Haddoway, James and William Clelands, in conſequence of his bond to produce them when called. They had been before the council 1677, for being at conventicles; but upon his lordſhip's bond the proceſs againſt them was delayed. At the ſame meeting the chancellor produced a letter from the earl of Dundonald, ſignifying that the commiſſioners of aſſeſſment for the ſhire of Renfrew ſcrupled the declaration, which they conceived related to burghs, and not to ſhires; whereupon they ordered that both the allegiance and declaration ſhould be tendered to them, and a liſt of the recuſants, &c. ſhould be ſent to the council. And, on the 13th of September, both theſe were re-impoſed on the burghs. At which time James Moſman was fined in 1000 merks, William Laing and another in 500 merks a piece; and ſix or ſeven more, all tenants of the laird of Cavers, 100 merks each for hearing Mr Welſh and other ejected miniſters; and the council gave them to know, that, unleſs they paid their reſpective fines againſt next November, they ſhall be tranſported. And they actually paſſed ſentence of tranſportation againſt Mr John Harroway, for preaching, baptizing and marrying without epiſcopal ordination, and refuſing to declare, upon oath, who the preſbyterian miniſters were by whom he was ordained. Robert Dick, merchant in Preſtonpans, was likewiſe indicted for being at a conventicle, and refuſing to clear himſelf by oath, he was declared guilty, and ordered to be baniſhed. They likewiſe ordered the earl of Linlithgow to bring in ſeveral perſons priſoners who had lately been at a conventicle near Renfrew. The ſame day they wrote to lord MacDonald ordering him to come before them on the 27th, and give ecurity for the peace of the bounds; but he was in no haste to obey their ſummons. And on the 16th the biſhop of Glaſgow was admitted a counſellor and a member of the committee for public affairs.

While the council was thus taken up about conventicles the trial of James and George Learmonts, William Temple, Robert Hepburn of Eaſt-fenton, and William Bryſon younger in Dumbar, came on before the juſtice court, conſiſting of lord Carrington juſtice general, lords Collingtoun, Strathord, Caſtlehill, Forret and Newton. They ſat down on the 11th of September, and the priſoners were indicted for being at the conventicle over againſt the Baſs, and being art and part in the murder of the ſoldier, &c. In the beginning of the proceſs the advocate paſſed from Hepburn and Bryſon, in order to purſue them before the council for field conventicles. Mr David Thoirs, advocate for the priſoners, pleaded that their ſimple preſence, in a croud of a thouſand perſons, cannot make them guilty; and offered to prove that they came unarmed; and that others, declared fugitives, and not them, were ſeen to ſtrike the deceaſed with ſwords and halberts, whereas the priſoners retired before the engagement. The king's advocate replied, that field conventicles were rendezvouzes of rebellion, and the priſoners preſence there in arms was enough to prove them guilty, which he undertook to make good. The lords, in their interlocutor, declared that preſence at field conventicles, and giving council and command, infer guilt, and accordingly referred the ſame to be proved.

The witneſſes were examined; and James Manderſtoun ſwore that he ſaw James Learmont at a field conventicle May the fifth; that he had no arms; but that he heard him ſay, Let no cowards be here to day; but let ſuch as have arms go out to the forefide; that he ſaw William Temple there with a ſword. Other two witneſſes ſwore much to the ſame purpoſe; but none ſwore that James Learmont had an actual concern in the engagement. In his laſt ſpeech he tells us, that the jury, at firſt, declared he was not guilty of the blood that was ſhed. Their verdict was, 'That they found William Temple guilty of being at the conventicle libelled, near the place where the man was killed, with a ſword under his arm, but not drawn; as alſo, that James Learmont was not only guilty of preſence, but of words, conform to the depoſition of witneſſes.'

When this was given in the advocate declared that they deſerved the diet againſt George Learmont. Several others who were at the ſaid conventicle, as Sheriff, Cowan, Dawſon, Brock, Miller and Bull, were called, and not appearing were declared fugitives, and outlawed. Next day, September 13th, the following ſentence was pronounced, viz. That James Learmont be taken to the Grafs-market of Edinburgh, on Friday the 27th inſtant, and there have his head ſevered from his body, &c. No ſentence was this day pronounced againſt Will. Temple; and though, according to their own law, he was certainly more guilty than James Learmont, yet a ſentence of tranſportation was all that paſſed againſt him.

This good man, James Learmont, was executed on the 27th according to his ſentence. In his laſt ſpeech, which is recorded in Naphtali, he bore an honourable teſtimony to the covenants and work of reformation, againſt popery, prelacy &c. prayed that God would give repentance, to thoſe who were acceſſory to his death, exhorted all people to ſhew loyalty to the king and all lawful magiſtrates, and all their juſt and lawful commands, in ſo far as they agreed with the word of God: and concluded his long ſpeech with theſe words, 2 Tim iv. 7, 8. 'I have fought a good fight, &c. Surely I come quickly. Amen. Even ſo come Lord Jeſus.'

On the 9th of October a letter from the king was read in council, ſignifying that he had granted commiſſions to raiſe a regiment of foot conſiſting of eight companies, and three troops of horſe of ſixty men each, beſides officers, for ſecuring the kingdom from foreign invaſions and inteſtine commotions, and requiring all the officers of the former and new levied forces to repair to their reſpective poſts upon pain of diſpleaſure. Upon this the council appointed the earls of Moray, Wigtoun, and Linlithgow, the biſhop of Galloway, (for he muſt be employed for the church in military affairs) the lords Elphingſton, Reh and Collingtoun, and Mr Maitland, or any three of them, to meet the 22d inſtant, and deliver commiſſions to the officers named by his majeſty, and to order them to rendezvous on the links of Leith the laſt Thurſday of November.

The ſame day Mr James Hamilton, the indulged miniſter at Evandale, was rebuked before the council for preaching in a vacancy, and ſo breaking his confinement; but, that being his firſt fault, he was diſmiſſed without any farther cenſure. And, at the ſame ſederunt, Alex. Buchanan in Bucklyvie, And. Buchanan in Shirgarton, and about ſeven others, were baniſhed for conventicles, and ordered to be kept priſoners till they ſhould be tranſported.

Next day the council appointed garriſons in ſeveral places of the Highlands, for preſerving the peace there, and permitted Dame Margaret Ker to wait upon the lord of Polwart, a priſoner in Dumbarton caſtle, till the 6th of November next.

In November a proceſs commenced againſt ſome of the indulged miniſters in the ſhire of Renfrew, as Mr Pat. Simpſon and Mr Jam. Wallace, for breaking their confinement: of which more next year. And on the ſeventh, Tho. and Will. Govans, Alex. Anderſon, Rob. Paterſon, James Wilſon, John Jervie, Jam. Brown, Nich. Cliſſhie, Dav. Kid, and John Arnot, having confeſſed their being preſent at conventicles, and refuſing to declare upon oath who preached, or who elſe were preſent, were baniſhed to the plantations, Mr John Govan denying that he was at the conventicles charged againſt him, and only had converſed with Mr Foreſter his brother-in-law, was ordered to ly in priſon till his caſe ſhould be farther conſidered. He was however ſet at liberty on the 11th of November. At the ſame time the council wrote to the lord MacDonald, commanding him to appear before them on the 28th inſtant. But that popiſh lord had a friend in court, and ſo paid but little regard to the charge.

On the 14th Mr A. Peden petitioned the council to be releaſed from Edinburgh jail, and permitted to repair to Ireland, eſpecially as he had not been charged with houſe or field conventicles for theſe twelve years paſt; but, inſtead of granting his petition, they ordered him to be tranſported to Virginia. After his ſentence was paſſed it was reported that Mr Peden ſeveral times ſaid, That that ſhip was not yet built that ſhould carry him or the other priſoners to any of the Engliſh plantations in America.

The ſame day a letter came from the king concerning raiſing and modelling 5000 foot and 500 horſe out of the militia; and the council ſent up inſtructions relating to this for his majeſty's approbation. Next day, November the 15th, they iſſued a proclamation for obſerving a public faſt on the 18th of December next, on account of the popiſh plot diſcovered in England.

The chief promoters and authors of this were, Pope Innocent XI. Cardinal Howard, Johannes Paulus de Oliva general of the Jeſuits at Rome, Pedro Jeronymo de Oxeda provincial of the Jeſuits in New Caſtile, La Chaiſe confeſſor to Lewis XIV. the provincial of the Jeſuits in England, the Benedictine monks at the Savoy, the Jeſuits and ſeminary prieſts in England, who were then in number about 1800, the lords Petre, Powis, Bellaſis, Arundel of Wardour, Stafford, and ſeveral perſons of quality. The deſign was to murder the king, ſubvert the conſtitution, introduce popery, and extirpate the proteſtant religion. When the king was taken off, the duke of York was to receive the crown as a gift from the pope, and hold it in fee. If any diſturbance happened, the city of London was to be ſet on fire, and the infamy of the whole was to be laid upon the preſbyterians and fanatics, in order to excite the church to cut them to pieces, the better to make way for the eaſier ſubverſion of the whole proteſtant religion. This plot was diſcovered, and ſeveral were executed for being concerned in it: and though it was diſcredited by many, yet it is plain the managers in Scotland believed it; and therefore, as I have obſerved, appointed a ſolemn faſt to be obſerved. As to the particulars of this wicked conſpiracy, I muſt refer the reader to the Engliſh hiſtorians, and go on to obſerve, That, on the 18th of November, Sir George MacKenzie was made juſticejuſtice-general, and Craigie juſtice-clerk. And, on the 11th, Thomas Wauch merchant in Hawick, William Turnbull, and Margaret Barclay, were ſentenced to be baniſhed for houſe and field-conventicles, becauſe they refuſed to ſwear as to the circumſtances of them.

The popiſh plot, above mentioned, had filled the nation with conſternation; and therefore, on the 28th, the council ordered the archbiſhop of Glaſgow, the earls of Moray and Linlithgow, the biſhop of Galloway, lord Halton, Mr Maitland, and Haddo, or any two of them, to inſpect the papers lately ſeized by the earl of Moray, and appointed the committee of public affairs to meet next day, and conſider the affair of the papiſts. But it is plain they could make no diſcoveries: for, on the 30th, they wrote to the king, in which they congratulate his majeſty upon the diſcovery of the plot, and aſſured him, that, after the ſtricteſt ſearch, they could not find that any in this kingdom had been concerned in that execrable and impious conſpiracy, and promiſed that they would not fail to make a farther inquiry. They wrote at the ſame time to Lauderdale much to the ſame purpoſe. And, December the 12th, ordered the magiſtrates of Edinburgh to ſearch through Edinburgh, Leith, and Canongate, next Sabbath and the following, for houſes where papiſts aſſembled and ſaid maſs, and to apprehend the prieſts, and all they ſhould find at theſe meetings, and impriſon them. They likewiſe wrote to the ſteward of Annandale to order a meeting houſe that had been lately erected near Caſtlemilk to be burnt and deſtroyed, and to ſend the names of thoſe by whom it was ordered to be built. So much for the proceedings againſt the papiſts. But what were theſe in compariſon of the methods of rigour, oppreſſion and tyranny taken with proteſtant non-conformiſts, whom they hunted like patridges on the mountains, fined, confined, impriſoned and baniſhed? For, on this very 12th of December, the council gave a warrant to the earl of Linlithgow to ſend a party to receive the following perſons, who had received ſentence of tranſportation for houſe and field conventicles, and to deliver them to Edward Johnſton maſter of the St Michael of Scarborough, then lying at Leith, viz. James, John and Robert Maxwells, William Urie, James Lickprevick and Robert Reid, all in Cathcart; William Niven in Eaſtwood; James Blackwood and David Corſbie in Carmonnock; Archibald Haddoway, John Bowie, William Hay, Mungo Cochran, John Anderſon ſervant, John Cumming, Arthur Dougal, William Rae, Gabriel Thomſon merchant, and William Steven, all in Glaſgow; David Ferguſon and Edward Gray in Bridgend; Mr Robert Meikle chaplain to Sir James Stewart, Stephen Porteous taylor in Canongate; John Clerk writer, Patrick Somervel and William Hackſton in Edinburgh; Adam Stobie of Luſcar, James Moſman of Mount, William Laing, John Cavers, Mr John Harroway, Robert Dykes, John and William Newmans, James Miller in Kirkaldy; George Alexander in Newburgh; David Barclay in Cowquhalty, Gilbert Marnock chapman, Thomas Mowbray, Alexander Stuart, James Law and John Fairbairn, all in Kirkliſtoun; William Angus in Aberuthven; James Brown, Robert Puntoun in Dalmenie: Richard Clidſdale, Mr Adam Abercorn chaplain to lady Cavers; William Turnbull brother to Beulie; — Cuningham cook to the earl of Strathmore; William Temple in Lintoun, Mr Alexander Peden miniſter, James Fyde, Robert Reid wright in Langſide; Thomas and William Govans, and Alexander Anderſon, ſervants; John Graham, Alexander and John Buchanans, Andrew Bowie, Walter MacGechan, John Urie, Daniel MacDonald, David Kid, John Arnot, John Jervie in Falkirk, and John Rae. Sixty ſeven in all.

They were delivered to Johnſton for the benefit of Williamſon, who was to carry them to Virginia. Mr Peden was of great ſervice to his fellow ſufferers, and frequently aſſured them of deliverance. Though they had a tedious paſſage between Leith and Graveſend, yet when they came thither Mr Williamſon was not there; where fore Mr Johnſton, who had the charge of their maintenance, after waiting ſome ſmall time for Williamſon, ſet them on ſhore to ſhift for themſelves. They received great kindneſs from the country, when they knew the cauſe of their ſufferings; and they generally got home to their own country. Mr Peden returned to Scotland about the month of June next year.

Alexander Anderſon, one of theſe exiles, who was not ſixteen years of age, in a paper he left behind him, dated December the 10th, takes notice, 'That he is the youngeſt priſoner in Scotland, and that the Lord had opened his eyes, and revealed his Son in his heart ſince he came under the croſs; that, though he had much difficulty to part with his friends and relations, yet he had now found that fellowſhip with Chriſt did much more than balance the want of the company of his deareſt relations. He declared his adherence to the work of reformation from popery and prelacy, to the national and ſolemn league and covenants, and witneſſed againſt pulling down the government of Chriſt's houſe, and ſetting up lordly prelacy, and joining with them. He regretted the indulgence, as what upon both ſides had been matter of ſtumbling and offence among good people; and declared his fears that a black and diſmal day was coming upon Scotland; that it is good to ſeek the Lord, and draw near to him, &c.

On the 19th of December James Daes of Coldingknows was obliged to beg pardon on his knees, for ſpeaking ſome words againſt the management of affairs at that time. The ſame day they had a letter from the king, thanking them for their care in moddelling the militia, and for the diſtribution they made of the 5000 foot and 500 horſe in the different ſhires through the kingdom; for by this means the militia, from which the ſaid foot and horſe were taken, effectually anſwered all the ends of a large ſtanding army, and was a promiſing method to bear down and ruin the preſbyterians. Every one of them for himſelf, as well as every one of the regular forces was appointed to take the following oath: viz. 'I. A. B. do ſwear to be true and faithful to my ſovereign lord king Charles, and his lawful ſucceſſors, and, in my ſtation, to maintain the preſent government in church and ſtate as it is now eſtabliſhed by law, and to oppoſe, to my power, the damnable principle of taking up arms againſt the king, or thoſe commiſſionate by him, upon any pretext whatſoever; and to be obedient in all things to his majeſty's major general or commander in chief, authoriſed by his majeſty for the time being, and will behave myſelf obediently to my ſuperior officers in all that they ſhall command me for his majeſty's ſervice. And I do farther ſwear, that I will be a true, faithful and obedient ſoldier, every way performing my beſt endeavours for his majeſty's ſervice obeying all orders, and ſubmitting to all ſuch rules and articles of war as are or ſhall be eſtabliſhed by his majeſty. So help me God.

To the tranſactions of this year I ſhall add a few things of which I have not the particular dates. Some time of it, when colonel Struthers was purſuing all Scotſmen in the northern counties of England, Henry Hall of Haughhead was engaged in a ſkirmiſh near Crocktom, a village on the Engliſh border, where that gallant and religious gentleman Thomas Ker of Hayhope was killed. Mr Hall after this came down to Scotland, where we ſhall meet with him next year. He had a religious education, and oppoſed the public reſolution. After the reſtoration he was a great enemy to prelacy, and ſuffered many hardſhips; ſo that he was obliged to leave his eſtate, and retire into the north of England in 1665. In the year 1666 he was taken when coming from Pentland, and, with ſome others impriſoned in Ceſford-caſtle; but was releaſed by the favour of the earl of Roxburgh who was his relation. Then he again retired to Northumberland, where he was very uſeful.

James Graham of Claverhouſe, who will make a diſmal figure in the next volume, came this year with a numerous party of ſoldiers, took free quarters for ſeveral days in the houſe of Gilbert MacMeihen in New-Glenluce pariſh; and when they went off, though they had conſumed ten times the value of the ceſs, they carried with them three horſes worth 10l. ſterling. John Arrol, who commanded this party, was killed next year at Drumclog, and had his bowels trod out by a horſe.

At another time this year an officer came with a company of wild Highlanders, and fired upon a number of people aſſembled for the worſhip of God at the hill of Coltenachar in Perthſhire. By a kind providence one Andrew Breddy was the only perſon who was killed. He left behind him a wife and four children.

We have had frequent occaſion to mention the Rev. Mr Blackadder, who, before the reſtoration, was miniſter at Troqueir near Dumfries. When the reſt of his brethren were ejected a party of the guards came to ſeize him, but he was out of the way. His wife and children, to whom the ſoldiers were very rude, were forced to retire to Barndennoch in the pariſh of Glencairn. In the year 1665 being with his wife at Edinburgh, a party of Sir James Turner's men came at midnight, turned their children out of their beds, and obliged one of them, in his ſhirt, to hold the candle till they ſearched the houſe, and went through Mr Blackadder's books and papers, and took away what they pleaſed. The manner in which they threatened the poor children is ſo ſhocking, that I forbear to mention it. After this he was forced to leave that houſe and ſcatter his family. Mr Blackadder was one of thoſe who preached in the fields, was againſt the indulgence, and continued in that practice till this year, when he went over to Holland, and was very uſeful in healing the breaches between Mr MacWard and Mr Fleming. We ſhall hear more of him next year.

It will now be proper to give ſome account of the ſufferings of the Rev. Mr James Webſter, who after the revolution was miniſter in Edinburgh, and died 1720. This worthy perſon ſtudied in the univerſity of St Andrews. About three or four days before the claſs was to receive their degrees, an order came from the archbiſhop to remove him from the claſs, becauſe he had not regularly attended upon ordinances as diſpenſed by epiſcopal miniſters. He was this year apprehended in the town of Dundee on the Lord's day afternoon, when at a private meeting for prayer, conference, and reading the ſcriptures. Next day the magiſtrates informed the council that they had ſeized a conventicle with Mr Webſter the preacher. The perſons taken with him were fined by order of the council; and he was kept 18 months priſoner. With difficulty he was releaſed upon urging the indemnity 1679, for he was yet no preacher. About the year 1685 or 1680, when he was living peaceably in the houſe of Grier of Diſcanth, a party of lord William Douglas's troop came on a Sabbath morning, and carried him to Dumfries. He was examined on the ordinary queſtions and was put into the thieves-hole, along with John Clerk a farmer, and John Haldane a weaver, who had for their companions three men who were in hold for robbery, murder and beſtiality. Mr Webſter and his two friends were kept in this naſty place about three weeks, and after that removed to the Pledge houſe, the uſual priſon for debitors, and was confined there four weeks, and then releaſed by lieutenant-general Drummond. The gentleman in whoſe houſe he was apprehended was likewiſe kept priſoner for ſome time. Soon after this Mr Webſter was a third time taken priſoner when walking the ſtreets of Edinburgh, but the viſcount of Strathallan quickly let him go.

I ſhall conclude this chapter by juſt mentioning the ſufferings of the Reverend Mr Alexander Wilſon miniſter at Cameron, in the preſbytery of St Andrews, from which he was ejected with others. About the beginning of November this year an order was procured by Sharp from the council, requiring the magiſtrates of Coupar to baniſh Mr Wilſon and his family from that town in forty eight hours after they received the orders. The intimation of this came to their hands on Saturday, when at the preparation ſermon before the ſacrament to be diſpenſed by an epiſcopal miniſter next day, ſo that they had patience till Monday, when the magiſtrates came to Mr Wilſon and intimated the orders to his wife, for he had thought proper to withdraw. They commanded her to leave the town in 24 hours. There was no withſtanding. Six ſmall children, with one of them ſick, could procure no favour. She therefore removed to a neighbour's houſe that very night, and next day the doors of her own houſe were ſecured; ſo that with the utmoſt difficulty ſhe could get as much of her own furniture as could ſerve her neceſſity; and, had it not been for the lady Preſtonhall Mr Wilſon muſt have had no ſhelter. However, he survived his troubles, and returned to his flock at Cameron after the revolution.

CHAP. XIV.

Of the proſecution for conventicles, and other branches of nonconformity, together with the violent death of the archbiſhop of St Andrews, till the riſing at Bothwel.

ON the 2d of January 1679, the council wrote to the archbiſhop of St Andrews, and the biſhops of Edinburgh and Aberdeen, enjoining them to call the maſters of the univerſities, and other ſchool-maſters, before them, and oblige them to take the oaths appointed them by law, and to deprive the recuſants; for they were reſolved that none ſhould be entruſted with the education of youth but thoſe of their own principles. We ſhall afterwards hear what was the effect of this.

On the 4th, Mr T. Warner, who had been indulged to the pariſh of Balmaclellan, was ſummoned before the council for not keeping his confinement, converſing with intercommuned perſons, and preaching at conventicles, and not appearing was outlawed. However, he ſurvived this tragical period, and continued at Balmaclellan till the day of his death 1716.

On the 9th Mrs Margaret Barclay, niece of Sir David Barclay of Collernie, who had for ſome time been in priſon at Edinburgh for being at private meetings, was ſet at liberty for the recovery of her health, upon giving ſecurity for 500 merks to return to jail by the 20th, if called, or when called, and mean while to confine herſelf to her room under the ſame penalty.

After many conſultations held about the end of the laſt year, for ſuppreſſing the preſbyterians, regulating the forces, collecting the ceſs, and other things of the like nature, at laſt, on the 9th of January, the committee of the council for public affairs agreed to ſend the following overtures to his majeſty for his approbation. 1. That the council appoint ſheriff-deputes, and other officers, to put the laws in execution, only againſt ſuch as withdraw from public ordinances, keep conventicles, are guilty of diſorderly baptiſms and marriages, harbour or converſe with fugitives, and intercommuned perſons, or vagant preachers, and may renew the commiſſions given to noblemen, &c. in Auguſt 1677, and give them ſuch other inſtructions as they ſhall think proper. 2. That the ſoldiers have orders to diſperſe conventicles by force of arms, and be indemnified for killing or wounding, in caſe any of theſe meetings make reſiſtance when commanded to diſmiſs in the king's name. 3. That the ſoldiers have power to ſeize and impriſon the preacher, and as many others as they can conveniently carry with them, until they find bail to anſwer for their crimes, &c. And, ſays the overture, 'in regard the multitudes, who frequent theſe rendezvouſes of rebellion, are ſuch as they cannot at all be ſeized, nor probation eaſily led againſt them, the ſoldiers be impowered to take from the reſt of the perſons found thereat (whom they cannot conveniently carry to priſon) their upper-garments, that the ſame may be a means of conviction, and an evidence againſt them; and that the ſoldiers be impowered to take all the arms that any perſon ſhall be found to have at theſe ſeditious meetings, and the horſes of any that ſhall have arms.' 4. That none be allowed to enter into the ſecond claſs in colleges, nor received apprentices, till they oblige themſelves to hear the church. 5. That his majeſty would be pleaſed to order the council to ſee, that act 5. ſeſſ. 2. and act 2. ſeſſ. 3. of his firſt parl. appointing magiſtrates and council of burghs, and others in public truſt, to take the declaration, and all the acts concerning pedagogues, chaplains, and ſchool-maſters, diſcharging them to officiate without licence from their reſpective ordinaries, and the acts and proclamations of council publiſhed thereupon, be put in due execution. 6. That the king would order the lords of the treaſury to pay 500 l. ſterling, to any who ſhould apprehend Mr John Welſh; 3000 merks for apprehending of any of their preachers who are declared traitors; 2000 merks, for each of thoſe preachers who are declared fugitives, or are intercommuned; and 900 merks for every other field preacher. And, 7. That the council proceed againſt all the indulged miniſters who do not obſerve their orders; and that, upon the decreaſe of any of them, the vacancy be ſupplied by the orthodox miniſters.

Theſe

Theſe overtures for ſuppreſſing ſchiſm, &c. were all approved of by the council, and ſent to his majeſty, who ordered the council to put them in execution, which they did accordingly.—Whence we may ſee the ſpirit of the then prevailing party, and that the execution of theſe things could not fail of exaſperating people to the higheſt degree. Such powers given to the military were not unprecedented, but entirely ſubverſive of the liberties of the ſubject.

While theſe things were in agitation, the council, on the 16th of January, wrote to Lauderdale, deſiring him to interpoſe with the king to allow one of his frigates to tranſport thoſe under ſentence of baniſhment to the plantations. Mr Peden and others, who had been ſent off laſt year, having been ſet at liberty, as has been related, the granting this would for the future prevent the like: whether this was complied with I know not; however, it is eaſy to ſee with what rigour they were willing to proceed againſt thoſe whom they called diſorderly perſons.

On the 19th, Mr William Veitch (after the revolution miniſter at Dumfries) returning in the night time to his own houſe to ſee his ſick child, was apprehended by major Oglethorp carried to Morpeth jail, and notice ſent to the court. He had been obliged to retire into the north of England, where he preached with great ſucceſs, and met with many remarkable eſcapes ſince the year 1671.

On the 23d, James Lawſon, a boy of 14 years of age, who had been impriſoned for being at conventicles (for under this adminiſtration no age was thought too young to be attacked) was, after ſome weeks confinement, ſet at liberty, the counſellors being juſtly aſhamed of ſuch ſeverity to a child.

The ſame day the council publiſhed a large proclamation againſt papiſts, but, like all others of this nature, no care was taken by the biſhops or judges to proſecute them; only G. Young, a popiſh prieſt, was, by order of the council, this day ſent to the Baſs. At the ſame ſederunt the biſhop of Galloway obtained the king's diſpenſation for non reſidence.

On the 31ſt the king's letter of the 25th was read in council, ordering them to receive upon the borders Mr Veitch, then priſoner at Morpeth, and confine him to the tolbooth of Edinburgh, and proceed againſt him with the utmoſt ſeverity of law. He was accordingly brought in priſoner to Edinburgh.

When ſuch oppreſſive meaſures were taken, it was pity that any thing ſhould have happened to divide preſbyterians among themſelves; but the indulgence being accepted by ſome, and refuſed by others as inconſiſtent with their principles, they who had not complied therewith looked upon it as their duty to bear teſtimony againſt it; and ſeveral at this time began, more than was formerly done, to preach up ſeparation from the indulged. And indeed no attempts were able to reconcile many of theſe people to thoſe who had given into ſuch a courſe of defection, as they juſtly looked upon the indulgence to be. Nay, conſiderable numbers broke off from the indulged; and, however ſome may condemn their conduct, yet they, no doubt, acted conſiſtent with their principles. Nevertheleſs ſome vacant pariſhes privately called preſbyterian miniſters to ſettle among them, as Mr Matthew Crawfurd to Lesmahago, and Mr Neil Gillies to Greenock.

On the 6th of February the council ordered the magiſtrates of Edinburgh, and other patrons, to turn the following perſons out of their charges, unleſs they take the oaths on or before the firſt of March next, viz. Meſſ. Alex. Dickſon, profeſſor of Hebrew in the college of Edinburgh, Geo. Sinclair ſchool maſter in South Leith, Geo. Allan his aſſiſtant, Alex Strang ſchool maſter in the Canongate, John Govan his aſſiſtant, with James Scot junior; the biſhop of Edinburgh having given information that thoſe perſons had not conformed: notwithſtanding ſeveral, if not all of theſe, choſe rather to undergo a courſe of ſuffering than comply. The ſame day Sir Patrick Hume of Polwart was ſent from Dumbarton to Stirling caſtle, and out of their great goodneſs they allowed his lady to be in the room with him.

The ſame day a proclamation was iſſued, offering the rewards ſpecified in the ſixth of the foregoing overtures. How ſtrange was it, that they, who called themſelves Proteſtant biſhops, ſhould thus proſecute and haraſs the greateſt enemies to popery in the nation, while, in the mean time, ſeveral popiſh prieſts and Jeſuits were now ſent down from England!

To execute theſe, and other laws of the ſame nature, the new levied forces were ordered weſt at the particular deſire of the prelates, ſome of them to ly at Glaſgow, in order to prevent the preaching of the goſpel in private houſes, or the adjacent fields; and, on the 13th of February, the army was diſperſed through the ſouthern and weſtern ſhires, in the beſt manner they could; for ſuppreſſing field-aſſemblies. And the council, the better to accompliſh their wicked deſigns, ordered the officers and ſoldiers, whenever they ſaw any number of people in the fields, to apprehend them until they gave bond, and obliged themſelves, under certain penalties, to live orderly, keep their pariſh churches, and not go afterwards to conventicles, &c. The ſame day the council ordered the committee for public affairs to nominate a few of their number to be a ſecret committee, with power to order whom they pleaſed to be apprehended.

Two days after this Mr Patrick Simpſon the indulged miniſter at Kilmacolm, was ordered to be denounced for not anſwering to his ſummons; but it would ſeem he gave a neceſſary excuſe, for he continued in the peaceable exerciſe of his miniſtry at that place ſeveral years thereafter.

On the 18th the magiſtrates of Glaſgow were ordered by the council to turn Mrs Blackwel out of her houſe, and take poſſeſſion of it. Her huſband, Mr T. Blackwel, had been declared fugitive. The ſame day Mr John Wallace, the indulged miniſter at Largs, was called before the council; though no proof could be brought againſt him, yet, becauſe he was not free to anſwer one of their enſnaring queſtions, they declared his indulgence void. At the ſame time the pariſhioners of Balmaclellan were diſcharged from paying any more ſtipend to Mr Warner till farther orders. The ſame day Gordon of Earlſtoun, Gordon of Holm, Gordon of Overbar, Neilſon of Corſack, MacCartney of Blaiket, Maxwell of Hills, Hay of Park, MacDougal of French, MacDougal of Corrochtree, James Johnſtoun late provoſt of Stranraer, William Spittle at Port, —— Johnſtoun collector there, Mr William Cathcart and John Inglis commiſſary of Kirkcudbright, being ſummoned to anſwer for conventicles and harbouring intercommuned perſons, and not appearing, were all ordered to be declared rebels, and outlawed.

Two days after William Page was fined in 1000 l. Scots, John Arnot in Greentide in 500 merks, and Geo. Marſhal in Balvaird in 100 l. Scots, for being at field-conventicles, and they were ordered to ly in priſon till they paid their fines.

On the 22d Mr Veitch was before the committee for public affairs. Sharp preſided, and put many enſnaring queſtions to him, in which he was ſeconded by the biſhop of Edinburgh; ſuch as, Have you taken the covenant? He replied, This honourable board may perceive that I was not of age to take the covenant when you and other miniſters of Scotland tendered it. In ſhort, he ſigned his examination; and though there was nothing found to militate againſt him, yet they gave it as their opinion that he ſhould be ſent to the Baſs till the king's pleaſure be known, becauſe he was forfeited for what they called the rebellion in 1666, and when the council ſat on the 25th, they approved of the judgment of their committee.

On the 25th of February John Inglis was turned out from being commiſſary of Kirkcudbright, but was afterwards remitted to the biſhop of Galloway, to be reponed as he ſaw cauſe.

The army being to march at this time, the council ordered them to be furniſhed with ammunition; and the ſame day appointed ſome, who attended the ſeſſion-houſe as agents, who were ſuſpected to correſpond with the outlawed miniſters, and others, to be called before their committee, and give ſecurity for their good behaviour for the future, or take the oath of allegiance, or elſe be baniſhed the town of Edinburgh. They likewiſe ordered Pat. Glaſs, who had been priſoner theſe four years paſt, to be ſet at liberty on his paying 200 l. of the fines impoſed upon him, and that the town-major have 58 l. ſterling ſterling for taking Mr Moſman, whom they called a vagrant preacher.

On the 27th they ordered a letter of thanks to be wrote to the earl of Seaforth, for his diligence in ſuppreſſing conventicles in the moſt northern parts.

The ſame day Mr Sam. Nairn, brother to the laird of Sanford, Mr James Rymer in Pitlochie, James Thomſon, — Miller, Will. Beltie, Tho. Neſs, Jam. Neſs, John Wiſheart, and David Heady, were ſummoned before the council for conventicles, and not appearing were denounced and put to the horn. The ſame day Mr James Dalrymple, who had been ordained by Preſbyterian miniſters, was informed againſt for preaching in the fields and in private houſes in Edinburgh, particularly in the houſe of one James Fea. This James Fea, and other of the hearers, were fined in 100 merks each, and the proceſs continued againſt Mr Dalrymple.

In order to proſecute the overtures before mentioned, the council, on the 27th of February, agreed upon a liſt of commiſſioners to execute the laws againſt the Proteſtant non-conformiſts, gave them inſtructions to uſe the utmoſt rigour, and named deputes in the ſeveral ſhires, each clothed with the power of a juſtice of peace, who had anarmy to aſſiſt and ſupport them. The curious reader may ſee the liſts and their inſtructions at large in Wodrow, vol. 2. p. 14. being too long to be inſerted here.

About the beginning of March the forces were ſettled in the particular places aſſigned them, with orders to purſue and ſearch for thoſe who frequented field meetings, to kill all who reſiſted them, to impriſon and deliver to magiſtrates, or ſend into the council, all whom they apprehended. A party of theſe military reformers ſeized about 23 countrymen of the pariſh of Evandale, ſeveral of whom were poor ſcraph erds, and made them ſwear, whether they ſaw anyarmed men going up and down for a month paſt. It would be endleſs to mention all their outrages, how they deſtroyed the corn with their horſes, threw what they could not uſe into the rivers in ſome places, and burnt it in others; ſo that the laws then in being were wholly ſubverſive of the liberties and properties of the ſubject. Theſe were the fruits of prelacy in Scotland!

Lord Roſs, and other officers of the army, made a ſtrict ſearch, through the weſt and ſouth, for intercommuned miniſters, field preachers, and others, ſo that many narrowly eſcaped, and were put to no ſmall difficulties, in wandering from place to place to conceal themſelves from their cruel enemies. However, at this ſearch there were only two taken, viz. Mr Archibald MacLean, a worthy old miniſter, who was ſo infirm that he could not get out of the way, and Mr William Kyle, who after the revolution was a miniſter in Galloway. They left off ſearching, for a few days, in hopes of ſurprizing the non-conformiſts. Accordingly, all of a ſudden, the ſearch was renewed, and Mr John Law was taken in a houſe belonging to the laird of Kincaid. And ſuch was the cruelty of theſe men, that, though he offered all manner of ſecurity to ſurrender at pleaſure, his wife being at the point of death, yet they were deaf to all he could ſay, hurried him to Edinburgh, and from thence to the Baſs, and, while on the road thither, he was never ſuffered to be alone, to commend either himſelf or his dying ſpouſe to God. About this time there was a ſtrict ſearch made in Edinburgh, where Mr Geo. Barclay (after the revolution miniſter at Uphall) was apprehended and put into the guard houſe. However, he got out of a window and made his eſcape, but afterwards endured many trials and preſervations, ſometimes in foreign countries, ſometimes in the north of England, and ſometimes in Scotland. Mr Robert Roſs and Mr James MacAulay were taken at Leith and ſent to the Baſs.

While theſe things were tranſacting, dame Margaret Stuart, and her huſband Sir William Fleming of Ferm, were brought before the council on the fourth of March. This lady was accuſed of being at ſeveral conventicles, and owning the charge Sir William was fined in 4000 merks.

But, as the Engliſh parliament ſat down March 6th, I muſt take a view of ſome things on the ſouth of the Tweed. The king had diſſolved his laſt parliament, in hopes to obtain a more pliable houſe of commons; but the elections were carried with great heat, and went every where almoſt againſt the court; for the people being diſcontented, and full of ſuſpicions and fears, choſe repreſentatives the moſt averſe to popery and arbitrary government. The king, to ſuppreſs the ſuſpicions, affected an extraordinary ſeverity againſt the papiſts; but this was too frequent an artifice to be capable of perſuading the people that his majeſty was truly zealous for the proteſtant religion.

When the time for the meeting of parliament drew near, his majeſty, perceiving a ſtorm gathering againſt the duke of York, by the advice of the earl of Danby, thought proper to ſend him abroad. 'Before he went away the king gave him all poſſible ſatisfaction with relation to the duke of Monmouth, who was then become very popular, ſeveral giving it out that he was the king's lawful ſon: but his majeſty made a ſolemn declaration in council, and both ſigned it, and took his oath on it, that he was never married, nor contracted to that duke's mother nor to any other woman except to his preſent queen. The duke of York went firſt to Holland, and then to Bruſſels, where he met with a cold reception.' However he had this to comfort him, that the king had given aſſurance that he never would conſent to any thing in prejudice to his right of ſucceſſion.

There was at this time a great oppoſition to the duke of Lauderdale, and the adminiſtration of affairs in Scotland as very much favouring popiſh deſigns. The earl of Shaftſbury had a very remarkable ſpeech in the houſe of lords, in which among other things, he ſaid,—'Popery and ſlavery, like two ſiſters, go hand in hand. In England popery was to bring in ſlavery, in Scotland ſlavery was to go before, and popery was to follow. I do not think that your lordſhips, or the parliament, have juriſdiction there. It is a noble and ancient kingdom, they have an illuſtrious nobility, a gallant gentry, &c. But yet we cannot think on England as we ought, without reflecting on the condition they are in. They are under the ſame prince, and the influence of the ſame favourite and counſels, and are hardly dealt with. Can we, that are the richer expect better uſage? For it is certain, that, in all abſolute governments, the pooreſt countries are moſt favourably dealt with, when the ancient nobility and gentry cannot enjoy their royalties.—If the council table there can impriſon any nobleman or gentleman for ſeveral years, without bringing him to a trial, or giving the leaſt reaſon for what they do, can we expect the ſame will ever preſerve the liberties of the ſubjects here?—They have lately plundered the richeſt and beſt countries of the kingdom, by having brought down the barbarous Highlanders to devour them, and all this without any colourable pretence; nor can there be found out a reaſon of ſtate for what they have done, but that their wicked miniſters deſigned to procure a rebellion at any rate; which, as they managed it, was only prevented by the miraculous hand of God.—My lords, I am forced to ſpeak this the plainer, becauſe, till the preſſure be fully and clearly taken off from Scotland, it is not poſſible for me, or any thinking man, to believe that good is meant us here.

The houſe of commons, being juſtly apprehenſive of the danger the nation was in from the increaſe of popery, the encouragement the papiſts ſecretly received, and, above all, from the duke of York, who by the aſſertors of the liberties of England, was looked upon as being at the bottom of all the mal-adminiſtrations they wanted to get rid of prepared a bill for excluding the duke from ſucceeding to the imperial crown of England, and bringing in the next proteſtant heir. This bill was twice read in the houſe, and ordered to be committed by 207 againſt 128. But his majeſty, not reliſhing theſe proceedings, prorogued the parliament till the 14th of Auguſt, by which means the excluſion-bill was defeated for a time. Thus we ſee what a brave ſtand theſe Engliſh patriots made at this time for their religion and liberties. They well knew, and the whole nation afterwards found, how inconſiſtent a popiſh prince over a proteſtant people was for ſecuring either the liberties of the ſubject, or the proteſtant reli-

tion. But it is time now to return to the affairs of Scotland.

On the 11th of March the council wrote to Lauderdale concerning Mr Veitch, to know his majesty's pleasure, especially since, as they declared, he was not found in any crime, and offered to prove that he was in Edinburgh at the time of Pentland. Mean while they ordered him to the Bass.

The same day the council wrote to Lauderdale, 'That 18 or 20 armed men, prompted by the bloody principles of their traiterous books, sent for major Johnstoun to the house of one Mrs Crawford, a known and most irregular fanatic, and, at his entry, discharged several shots at him, and those he had with him; after which, with drawn swords, they beat, bruised, and threatened to kill him, if he would not swear never to dissipate conventicles; which he having refused, according to his duty, they mortally wounded him, and some that were with him.' But however the matter might have been thus represented to them, yet it was aggravated beyond the truth. The case was, that two or three persons, whom the major bore hard upon for their non-comformity, in order to have a little revenge, got some to give him notice of a meeting where they were to be, and when he went thither, heartily drubbed him, but there was nothing like mortal wounds. However, this was looked upon as a high crime and misdemeanour, and a proclamation was issued for apprehending the guilty, and a handle made for prosecuting the innocent; for the same day they made an act, ordering lists to be given in to the magistrates of all the lodgers in Edinburgh every night, and that the wives and families of all outed ministers be turned out of the town by the 21st of March; nay, they enacted farther, that all persons who were summoned, shall, in case of not appearing, be reputed guilty, and fined.

On the 18th of March Mr Veitch was ordered to be prosecuted before the justiciary on the 24th; at which time he was brought to the bar, and prayed that he might be allowed advocates to plead for him, and that his case might be laid before his majesty. The lords not being willing to pass sentence of death upon a forfeiture in absence 13 years ago, as some would have had them, postponed the matter till the 8th of April; and, when they met then, they farther delayed it till June, and from that to July, when we shall meet with him again.

Mean while, on the 30th, there was a large meeting at Camberhead near Lanerk. A party was sent to disperse it, but, understanding their strength, they contented themselves with rifling some women, as they went, of their plaids and bibles, and seizing some men. Upon this a considerable body went from the meeting in arms, and demanded the prisoners. The officers refusing to comply, a scuffle happened, wherein the commander was wounded, and some taken prisoners, whom they very soon released. This occasioned the adjacent country to be much harassed for several weeks.

In the mean time, on the 2d of April, the council, being informed of conventicles in Edinburgh, resolved to prosecute the landlords of those houses where they were held. Accordingly one George Turnbull, a baker, was fined in 300 l. Scots, because of three conventicles said to be kept in the chamber of Isabel Crawford one of his tenants. At the same sederunt Gordon of Craichlaw younger, and his spouse, Gordon of Colvenan, MacGhie of Drumboy, Ramsay of Boghouse, Dame——Stuart Lady Castlestuart, MacGhie of Larg, Heron of Littlepark, Dunbar younger of Machiemore, Archibald Stuart of Castlesend, Anthony Heron in Wigg and his spouse, Stuart of Tondergie, MacGhie in Penningham, MacMillan in Craigwell,——Stuart of Ravenstoun and his lady, together with——provost of Wigtoun, were summoned for non-conformity and, not appearing, were denounced and put to the horn. And it is observable, that the episcopal incumbents sent lists of such persons as these to Edinburgh, urging the council to prosecute them, so that great numbers were denounced in absence. These severe proceedings obliged many to wander from place to place, and therefore no wonder though they embraced the first opportunity to relieve themselves from such oppressions.

The accounts of the scuffle at Lanerk, on the 30th last, came to the council on the 3d of April, aggravating the matter to the last degree; upon which they ordered preparations to be made for sending soldiers to those parts. The same day they appointed William Carmichael, sheriff depute of Fife, to proceed against the non-conformists in Fife. His violent oppressions were such, that several were provoked to resolve on cutting him off; but missing him, they fell upon the archbishop of St. Andrews, as we shall hear. At the same time orders were given to the sheriff-deputes of Fife and Kinross to call before them those who were concerned in rescuing Mr Walter Denoon from a party that was carrying him to Edinburgh.

Next day a committee was appointed to examine into the affair of the scuffle, in Lanerk; the earl of Argyll had his majesty's thanks for securing the peace of the Highlands, and on the 12th a commission was granted to his lordship to use his utmost endeavour to disarm the papists there, particularly lord MacDonald, Keppoch, MacLean of Torlaish, MacLean of Ardgoner, and MacLean of Berlois, or others suspected of popery.

On the 25th the committee appointed to examine into the affair of Lanerk met there; upon their strictest inquiry could find nothing but what has been related; only, in their report which was given in to the council, they mentioned the murder of two soldiers near Newmills which was charged unjustly upon the suffering party. The actors were not known, only there was great reason to suspect one John Scarlet, a person of a most infamous character. I shall only trouble the reader with the circumstances of this murder. The fact was certain, and the noblemen, heritors and gentlemen in the shire of Ayr, where it was committed, met on the 28th, and sent in a letter to the council signifying their abhorrence of it, and their dissatisfaction with armed conventicles, and with some of the doctrines preached at them.

The reader has seen that it was necessity, and the great law of self-preservation, that obliged people to go armed to those meetings, for their better security against the soldiers who were sent to disperse them; and, as they looked upon the indulgence as inconsistent with presbyterian principles, and the cess as an unlawful tax, imposed with no other design than to suppress the meetings of the Lord's people for public worship, and persecute those who could not in conscience comply with prelacy; so it is not to be wondered though they warned their hearers against complying with these things. How far they may have exceeded I cannot determine. No doubt, had they observed the rules of carnal prudence, they would both have desisted from meeting together, or, if they did meet, have been altogether silent as to these things, But what could be expected from men who made conscience of their principles, and on that very account were made to suffer all manner of hardships, but that they would bear testimony against every method taken by their persecutors to overturn their civil and religious liberties, and that they would use their utmost to defend themselves? Accordingly, finding that small meetings were more exposed to danger than larger assemblies, they therefore altered their method and determined to confine themselves to one meeting, and that in such places which they thought stood in most need of the gospel, and where they might assemble and preach with greater safety. It is true many serious and good people, ministers as well as others, did not chuse to take these methods. Mr Welsh, &c. preached in those places where they were but few that came armed. And in this situation matters with respect to field meetings continued from December till May.

In the beginning of April the worthy Mr James Welwood brother to Mr Andrew, author of a treatise intitled, The Glimpse of Glory, died at Perth, in the 30th year of his age. The night after he died his corpse were removed from John Barclay's house into a private room belonging to one Janet Hutton, till his friends might consult about his funeral, that John Barclay might not come to trouble for concealing him. It was quickly spread abroad that an intercommuned preacher was dead in the town; upon which the magistrates ordered a messenger to go and arrest the corpse, and would not suffer them to be interred at Perth, but ordered the town militia to be raised ed, and imprisoned John Price box master or treasurer to the guildry, for refusing to give out the militia arms. However the magistrates allowed his friends to carry the corpse out of the town, and bury them where they pleased without their precincts; but any of the town's people who were observed to accompany the funeral were apprehended and committed to prison. At last the corpse were with great difficulty interred in the church-yard of Drone. This is a lasting evidence of the tyranny of the managers in this period, who would neither suffer the persecuted people to be at peace when alive, nor to be buried when dead.

On the 1st of May the council, being alarmed with the accounts they received concerning the persons who attended the field meetings in arms, gave authority to the earl of Linlithgow to order a party of horse, foot, and dragoons to pursue Messr. Welsh, Cameron, Kid, or Douglas, and their followers, to seize and apprehend all who attended their conventicles, and, in case of resistance, to pursue them to the death. The execution of these orders occasioned the rising that fell out next month, as we shall relate.

On the 3d, while a party of horse was riding furiously to Coupar of Fife, Andrew Ayton younger of Inchdarnie, going to his aunt's the lady Murdochcairne, perceived them, and rode hard to escape. One of them observing this, broke from the rest by order of the commander, and without asking any questions, fired at the young gentleman, and mortally wounded him, for two balls went through his body. Such was the cruelty of this party, that though his relation Sir John Ayton sent to Coupar for a surgeon, they ordered that no surgeon should leave the town without permission; nay, they sent some of their number to bring him that night to Coupar. On the way he fainted four times through the effusion of blood. The magistrates suffered him to be carried to an inn, where he died next morning, and heartily forgave the soldier by whom he was murdered. This pious youth was but 18 years of age, and had for some time been intercommuned. When he went with others to visit Mr James Welwood on his death-bed, and gave him an account of the tyranny and wickedness of Sharp, Mr Welwood said, You'll shortly be quite of him, and he'll get a sudden and sharp off going, and ye will be the first that will take the good news of his death to heaven; which came litterally to pass.

For, on the 3d of May, Mr James Sharp, archbishop of St. Andrews, came to his untimely end. There were several accounts given of this remarkable event. It will be sufficient to my present purpose to lay before the reader the substance of what was published by the authority of the council, taken from the bishop's daughter and his servants who were present, the substance of those given by the actors concerned, by which means he will have the narrative of both sides. The substance of what was published by authority is as follows.

'On the 3d of May—this excellent prelate,—about nine o'clock in the morning, took his coach in Kennoway —accompanied only with four of his servants, and his eldest daughter in the coach with him. About half an hour before he was attacked, his great soul, it seems, presaged what came to pass, he fell on a most pious and serious discourse to his daughter, giving her such pious instructions and directions as he would have done if upon his death bed; whereunto she gave such becoming and satisfactory answers, that he embraced and formally blessed her. Afterwards coming near to a farmer's house called Magus, he says, There lives an ill-natured man, God preserve us, my child. Within a very little time after, the coachman perceiving some horsemen on the spur after them, calls to the postilion to drive on, for those men had no good in their minds. My lord finding the coach run so hard, looked out to see what the matter was; and then perceiving armed men pursuing, he, turning to his daughter, said, Lord have mercy upon me, my poor child for I am gone. Upon which presently three or four of the ruffians fired at the coach, but touched neither of them in the coach. The coachman put faster on and outrun the most part of the rogues (my lord's own servants, of which the best armed was wounded in the head by a sword, being mounted on weak hackney horses, had fallen behind before this, and were disarmed at the first coming up) while at last one of the best mounted overhighed the postilion, and by wounding him in the face, shooting the coach-horse which he led in the back, and cutting him in the hams, turned the coach out of the way, and gave the rest the advantage to come up. Then they fired again: one of them had his pistol so near my lord, that the burning calfin was left on his gown, and was rubbed off by his daughter, which wounded him two or three inches below the right clavicle, in betwixt the second and third ribs; and then another of them, on the other side of the coach, run him upon the region of the kidneys with a small sword; thereafter they called, Come out, cruel and bloody traitor; but not any offered to lay hands upon or drag him out of his coach, as is falsly reported in the relation, the assassins being all yet on horseback; whereupon most composedly, he opened the door of the coach himself, and stept out; and then said, Gentlemen, you will spare my life, and whatever else you are pleased to do you shall never be questioned for it. They told him there was no mercy for a Judas, an enemy and a traitor to the cause of Christ. Well then, said he, I shall expect none from you; but promise to me to spare my poor child, directing his speech to one, whom it is suspected, by looking him broad in the face, he knew; and reaching forth his hand to him, the bloody villain starts back from my lord, and, by a mighty blow, cut him more than half through the wrist. Then said my lord, I hope you will give me some time to pour out my soul to God, and I shall also pray for you; and presently falling on his knees, he said, Lord forgive them for I do. Lord receive my spirit. While thus praying on his knees, (one of the traitors, standing some paces off, called to the rest, Spare those gray hairs) and his hands lifted up, they struck furiously at him, and wounding him therein in three places, which nevertheless he kept up bleeding to heaven, while one of them cut him to the very bone, a little above the left eye; whereupon my lord said, Now ye have done the turn; then falling forward he stretched himself out and laid his head on his arm, as if he had been to compose himself for sleep, when some of the villains from their horses, and others a-foot (having alighted) gave him about fifteen or sixteen wounds in the head, and, in effect, the whole occipital part was but one wound; after which they riffled his pockets, and took some papers out of them and so mad was their spite and rage, that even after he was dead, and the murderers gone some way from the body, one of the furious and bloody assassins returned, and thurst twice or thrice at him with a sword. They robbed his daughter of some gold and other things she had in a little box, (they had wounded her, thrusting at her father, betwixt whom and them she had interposed herself, by a stab in her thigh and one of her thumbs) then they took away my lord's night-bag, &c. They also robbed his servants, and took their arms from them; and then went away as they came.—Thus fell that excellent prelate.—

The reader will now expect the account of this matter from the papers and relations of the actors concerned.

During the last and current year the persecution was most severe in the county of Fife, and particularly William Carmichael was impowered to seek for and prosecute all non-conformists and intercommuned persons in that shire. Besides his apprehending, fining and imprisoning multitudes, it was his custom to seize servants, and put fiery matches between their fingers, together with several other methods of torture, in order to force them to discover where their masters were, or any thing belonging to them. He would likewise beat women and children to make them inform against their husbands and parents; not to mention rapes, adulteries, and other instances of abominable wickedness.

As the suffering people had no legal way of redress, several of the wanderers of this shire, being deprived of the protection of the laws of their country, resolved to get rid of Carmichael; and for this purpose fixed on Saturday the third of May, when as they were informed he was to be a hunting. Accordingly, about nine of these persons, some of them being gentlemen of good families, upon the day appointed, searched for him through all the country round Coupar, but to no purpose.

While

While they were talking of ſeparating and quitting their project, they were informed by a boy that the archbiſhop's coach was at Ceres, and in a little would come that way. This much ſurpriſed them, that, when they were juſt parting and giving over their ſearch for the ſervant the maſter ſhould come in the way, even their arch enemy and ſource of all their miſeries. Upon which one of them ſaid it ſeems he is delivered into our hands, and propoſed to embrace this opportunity for cutting him off, and that one ſhould have the command of the reſt for that purpoſe. Mr Hackſtoun of Rathillet being preſent, this burden was laid on him; but he oppoſed the motion, and would have no hand in what followed, whether becauſe it was a matter of blood, as to which he was not clear in his own mind, as my author affirms, or if, as others alledge, it was becauſe that he having received perſonal injuries from the archbiſhop, it might be thought that he did it in revenge, I cannot certainly ſay.

By this time they were come to a little village called Magus, where they diſcovered the biſhop's coach. One of them, on a ſwift horſe, rode up to ſee if Sharp was in it. The biſhop obſerving him, cried out to the coachman to drive on. The gentleman hearing this threw off his cloke and purſued at full ſpeed, as likewiſe did the reſt, only Rathillet kept at a diſtance, and did not at all engage in the action. While they were thus purſuing in Magus-muir, Wallace, one of the biſhop's ſervants, turned upon him and cocked his piece; but ſome of them coming up ſoon diſmounted and diſarmed him; and as the coach was driving furiouſly away, they fired their muſkets, but could not ſtop it, till the perſon on the ſwift horſe came up to the coach crying out, Judas, Be taken. The primate called with the greater violence, Drive, drive, drive; but at laſt they cut the traces of the coach and ſtopt it.

By this time the reſt were come up and found the biſhop's daughter with him in the coach, and therefore the captain ordered him to come out, that no harm might come to her, whom they had no intention to hurt. This he refuſed; whereupon two of them, the reſt being engaged in diſmounting and ſecuring his ſervants, fired upon the biſhop, while his daughter was ſhrieking and crying moſt bitterly. But finding that he was not touched, the captain commanded him to come out; and, while the biſhop lingred, and cried for mercy, the commander ſaid, 'I take God to witneſs, whoſe cauſe I deſire to own in adhering to the perſecuted goſpel, that it is not out of any hatred of your perſon, nor from any prejudice you have done or could have done to me, that I intend now to take your life, but becauſe you have been and ſtill continue to be an avowed oppoſer of the goſpel and kingdom of Chriſt, and a murderer of his ſaints, whoſe blood you have ſhed like water.' Another ſaid, 'Repent, Judas, and come out.' The biſhop replied, 'Gentlemen, ſave my life, and I will ſave yours.' The firſt anſwered, 'I know it is not in your power to ſave us or to kill us: I again declare, it is not any particular feud or quarrel I have at you, which moves me to this attempt, but becauſe you are an enemy to Chriſt and his intereſt, and have wrung your hands in the blood of his ſaints, not only after Pentland, but ſeveral times ſince; and particularly for your perjury and ſhedding the blood of Mr James Mitchel, and having a hand in the death of James Learmont, and your perfidious betraying of the church of Scotland. Theſe crimes, added he, and that blood, cry with a loud voice to heaven for vengeance and we are this day to execute it.' And again he ordered him to come out, and prepare for death, judgment and eternity. The biſhop ſtill refuſed, and cried for mercy and offered him money. The captain ſaid, 'Thy money periſh with thee:' and told him he allowed him time to pray, and commanded him again to come out. The biſhop ſtill refuſed. One of them at a diſtance cried out, 'Seeing there have been ſo many lives unjuſtly taken by him, for which there is not the leaſt ſign of repentance, we will not be innocent if any more be taken that way.'

Then one of them fired a piſtol at him in the coach, which did not touch him; and another wounded him with a ſword, at which he cried out, Fy, fy, I am gone; but the wound was not mortal. At laſt, when he found they would force him out of the coach, he thought proper to come out. But by no means could they perſuade him to pray, which much ſurpriſed them. Then they diſcharged a power of ſhot upon him, which made him fall back, ſo that he lay as dead.

But one of them giving him a prick with his ſword, he raiſed himſelf. Then being apprehenſive that ſhooting would not do, the commander ordered them all to draw their ſwords, upon which he made the moſt hideous and terrible ſhrieks that ever were heard. At laſt the commander ſtruck him with a ſhable on the face, and one of his chops fell down. He tried to ſpeak, but was not underſtood. They redoubled their ſtrokes, and killed him outright. But they took nothing with them but arms and papers; and after diſmounting and diſarming his ſervants, they rode away in a body to a place three or four miles from Magus-muir, and continued till night, when they ſeparated, and ſhifted for themſelves the beſt way they could. When they reflected on what they had done, they were much ſurpriſed at their own preſervation, ſince the whole was tranſacted between twelve and one at mid day.

Thus fell archbiſhop Sharp. And the reader will obſerve, that the main difference between the two accounts I have given conſiſts in the biſhop's carriage; the former repreſents him as a ſaint, and the latter as averſe to any thing like preparation for death: but which of the two is moſt conſiſtent, with the carriage and behaviour of this prelate, through the former courſe of his life, muſt be left with the reader. This matter is moſt unjuſtly charged on the whole body of the preſbyterians; nay, the actors themſelves had no thoughts of making any attempt upon him, till, miſſing Carmichael his coach came in their way.

It is ſaid that the biſhop had ſeveral notices that he would come to an untimely end, as his having a remarkable dream to this purpoſe while at the univerſity But I ſhall not trouble the reader with theſe things. The action was much condemned. It was ſaid, That, let the biſhop have been ever ſo bad, yet the actors had no right to purſue him to death; for none of them had the power of the ſword, nor were in any public judicative capacity, and conſequently what they did was murder and aſſaſſination. On the other hand, it was ſaid, that, as the archbiſhop was a murderer and avowed perſecutor of God's people, an apoſtate from, and a betrayer of the cauſe of Chriſt, and as it was not poſſible to have recourſe to the magiſtrate for juſtice, the conſtitution of the government being overturned, the actors could not therefore be charged with murder, nor the action be eſteemed any other but an extraordinary execution of the law of God againſt ſuch a capital offender; beſides, they looked upon themſelves as in a ſtate of war, and conſequently as having a right to cut off their great enemy, by whom they and others were perſecuted to death. An ingenious author has theſe words in his political diſcourſes. 'Cæſar had violated every tie that can bind the human ſoul, oaths, truſt, and law; he had violated every thing dear to human kind, their peace, liberty, rights and poſſeſſions. He did all this by means the moſt black and flagitious; by plots, faction, corruption, robbery, devaſtation, ſacrilege and ſlaughter. What was left to the oppreſſed Romans to do under the bonds of the oppreſſor with his ſword at their throat? Law and appeals were no more; a tyrant was their maſter, the will of a tyrant their law.—In ſhort, there was no other way of aboliſhing his tyranny, but by diſpatching the tyrant.' How applicable this is to the preſent caſe muſt be left with the reader; only it is obvious, that, whether the actors were right or wrong, he met with the juſt reward of his deeds, and God was righteous in the providence. By his death new deſigns of cruelty were prevented; for the laſt thing he did was voting for and puſhing a violent proclamation we ſhall hear of, dated the 1ſt of May; on the 6th he was to have gone to court to uſe his utmoſt for more cruel and rigorous methods of oppreſſions againſt the ſufferers: but my author juſtly remarks, that though Saul, when breathing out cruelty againſt the Chriſtians, was converted; yet this apoſtate, when doing the like, went to his own place.

It likewiſe deſerves a remark, that, after the moſt diligent and exact ſearch, none were ever apprehended that were actually concerned. They who were executed on this account, on Magus-muir, afterwards, were no ways acceſſoacceſſory. Mr Hackſtoun of Rathillet was indeed preſent, and afterwards taken and put to death; but we have heard how he behaved. One Andrew Guillan was likewiſe preſent, and afterwards executed; but all the hand he had was, that, living near the place, he was taken out of his houſe, held their horſes, and was a witneſs of what was done.

9 Though this violent death of the archbiſhop was made by a few private perſons, and by them too without any premeditated deſign, till they had information of his coach's coming that way, yet, as has been obſerved, it was unjuſtly laid to the charge of the whole body of the preſbyterians, and particularly repreſented as one of the dismal effects of field meetings, theſe rendezvouzes of rebellion, as they were called. But, had they put the ſaddle on the right horſe, if the archbiſhop's death was murder, they ſhould have looked upon themſelves as the murderers, in ſupporting that perfidious prelate in thoſe arbitrary meaſures, whereby the ſpirits of the people were juſtly exaſperated, and they conſtrained, in their own neceſſary defence, to do what they did. However, the managers never thought of thoſe things, but made uſe of this as a handle for farther unheard of ſeverities.

Accordingly, when the news of this affair reached Edinburgh, the council met on Sabbath the 4th of May, and after taking the depoſitions of the biſhop's ſervants, they publiſhed a long proclamation for diſcovering and apprehending the perſons concerned in this action; in which, after having diſplayed all their rhetoric in expoſing the cruelty of the fact, they, among other things, ordered all perſons in the ſhire of Fife, upon certain days, to meet at certain places mentioned in the proclamation, in order to be confronted by the witneſſes; and ſecured all who were under letters of horning, or intercommuned, from all danger of being apprehended for the ſpace of 48 hours before and after the times appointed for their appearance; at the ſame time certifying, that whoever ſhould not appear, ſhould be reputed either guilty or acceſſory. They likewiſe offered an indemnity to any of the aſſaſſins who ſhould diſcover their accomplices and a reward of 10 000 merks to any who ſhould inform who the aſſaſſins were, to be paid upon their being apprehended or convicted. At the ſame time they wrote to the king and Lauderdale giving an account of theſe things. I ſhall make no remarks here, ſince all this is nothing but what might have been expected: but one would think they took a very improper method. For can any imagine that any concerned in this fact would ever appear at any of thoſe meetings appointed in the proclamation?

On the ſame day about 30 perſons were hearing Mr William Hamilton at the houſe of Mrs Durham his relation. They were all ſeized, and immediately committed to priſon, where ſome continued a longer, and others a ſhorter time. Mrs Durham and Mrs Carſtairs were releaſed after a few days; but the managers were moſt cruel to the preacher; for, though he was ſeized with a flux, and preſented a petition atteſted by two phyſicians, that his life was in hazard, praying that he might, for a little, have the benefit of the air, and offered any bail that could be deſired, yet they rejected the petition, and aſſured his friends they would proſecute him for houſe conventicles next council day; but before that time he died in priſon, and ſaved them the trouble. This excellent pious youth was brother to the laird of Halcraig, was no intercommuned perſon, nor was any thing ever laid to his charge, unleſs his preaching once in a relation's houſe to a few friends after public worſhip was over. For this conventicle the magiſtrates of Edinburgh were fined according to the laws of this period.

Beſides this inſtance of ſeverity to a perſon who could have no acceſſion to the biſhop's death, vaſt numbers were exceedingly haraſſed in Fife and other places, particularly John Archer, tallow chandler in Strathmiglo, who had ſuffered much in his perſon and family ſince 1674. He was, ſoon after the biſhop's death, apprehended in his own houſe and ſent priſoner to Edinburgh, without any reaſon aſſigned; neither could he think of the cauſe, till he was brought before the council, and charged with being acceſſory to the biſhop's death. But though he cleared that he was in Edinburgh for ſeveral days before and after that fact, yet it was with great difficulty he was ſet at liberty about the end of the year.

Mean while, on the 8th of May the council emitted a proclamation, diſcharging all ſubjects to travel in arms without a licence, except noblemen, landed gentlemen, and their children and ſervants travelling with them. They likeways wrote to Lauderdale, giving him an account of their proceedings and diligence in apprehending thoſe that were concerned in the death of the primate. They alſo ordered the earl of Linlithgow to diſpoſe his forces in the beſt manner he could for ſuppreſſing conventicles, and made Adam Urquhart of Meldrum for his diligence in their ſervice, a juſtice of peace in the ſhire of Roxburgh, to act in conjunction with Henry Ker of Graden; and afterwards he was made one in Tevviotdale, the Merſe and Selkirk.

While theſe things were a doing, the committee for public affairs had impowered the ſheriff depute of Fife to ſecure and make an inventary of the goods of John Balfour of Kinloch, Hackſtoun of Rathillet, and the three Balfours of Gaſtoun, as being moſt ſuſpected of the affair of the archbiſhop, till they be apprehended and brought to a trial. They had alſo called before them ten perſons apprehended by Meldrum; two of whom viz. Robert Neilſon and Nicol Story, they remitted to the advocate, becauſe of the diſcoveries they were ſuppoſed to make of Mr Welſh. They found that the bail for Mr Alex. Gordon had forfeited their bond for not producing him, and therefore had incurred the penalty of 5000 merks; that Mr And. Kennedy of Clowburn be reputed guilty, and fined in 1000 merks, for refuſing to ſwear (which was accordingly inflicted in a few days after) that Mr John Law be diſmiſſed, Bennet of Chеſters be continued in priſon, and Scot of Pitlochie be ſummoned to appear the next council day. The council approved of all this on the ſaid 8th of May.

On the 13th the council met, and received the king's letter, approving the draught of a proclamation againſt field conventicles, which they ordered to be publiſhed. By this proclamation, all judges and officers of the army were ordered to proceed againſt all who go to field meetings with arms, as traitors, nay, and to execute the laws againſt thoſe who go to field-meetings without arms; adding, 'We being fully convinced, by reaſon and experience, that thoſe meetings do certainly tend to the ruin and reproach of the Chriſtian religion and diſcipline, to the introduction of popery and hereſy, the ſubverſion of monarchy, and the contempt of all laws and government.' So that, by this proclamation, the officers of the army were, in a manner, either veſted with the authority of judges, or elſe had power to haraſs or deſtroy the poor ſuffering people; which, in proceſs of time, they actually did.

The draught of this proclamation was made on the firſt of this month, and very much puſhed forward by Sharp, and was the laſt public deed in which he was concerned, though not publiſhed till after his death; for the council would not enact it till they had firſt got the king's approbation. However, this was the primate's legacy, and a ſpecimen of what he would have done had he gone up to court. Can any then be ſurprized when ſuch ſanguinary laws were made, that the people, diſtreſſed by ſuch a ſeries of oppreſſions, ſhould think of concerting meaſures to reſcue themſelves from the bondage of their oppreſſors? It is rather ſurpriſing that they bore thoſe things ſo long.

On the 14th, Mr George Scot of Pitlochie was fined in 3000 merks for conventicles, and Mr Patrick Simſon was turned out of Kilmacolm, where he had been indulged, for breach of confinement, and keeping of conventicles; but afterwards he received a little more favour. At the ſame time, the council had a letter from the king, declaring that he will reſent the biſhop's death, and recommending to them to go on in their ſearch for thoſe concerned in it; to which they ſent a very reſpectful anſwer.

On the 25th, Mr John Spreul writer in Glaſgow, who had been ſome time in priſon, and Mr Robert Wylie, were both ſet at liberty upon giving bond to appear when called; and the ſame day, the council approved the overture, obliging heritors either to produce their tenants, or be liable for their delinquency.

On the 27th, the council wrote to his majeſty, ſignifying that the earl of Argyll had deſired aſſiſtance againſt the lord MacDonald and the rebel papiſts; but, conſidering the great increaſe of field conventicles, they could not ſpare any of the ſtanding forces; however, they had iſſued a proclamation againſt them; and ordered the ſheriffs of Dumbarton and Bute to join the earl. May not the reader here ſee, that our Scots epiſcopalians were more zealous in perſecuting proteſtant non conformiſts, than in oppoſing popery?

The ſame day the council approved the following report made to them from their committee for public affairs, viz. their ordering farther ſearch to be made for thoſe who had killed the primate, and that witneſſes ſhould be brought againſt Henry Schaw an intercommuned perſon; that they had diſmiſſed upon bond the priſoners taken by Muldrum, except Meilſon and Story; that they had ordered the ladies Torwoodlie, Gallaſhiels, and Newton younger, the laird and lady Aſhieſtiel, the lady Fernylie, Mrs Pringle and her daughter, with ſeveral other perſons of meaner rank, who had been ſurprized at a conventicle by Claverhouſe, to be ſummoned before the council; that they remitted Mr Thomas Wilkie, the miniſter taken at that conventicle, and Mr Francis Irvine, an intercommuned miniſter, to the council, by whom they were ordered to the Baſs; and that they had ordered Mr James Deas to pay his fine by the ſecond Tueſday of June, and to re-enter the priſon on that day. But before that time they had other buſineſs on their hands.

Thus I have finiſhed the firſt part of this work. And, though it opens a black and diſmal ſcene, yet the next part will give us a more horrible repreſentation; for the perſecution not only continued, but ſtill grew more and more ſevere. It is our happineſs we do not live in ſuch times of ſlavery and oppreſſion; but it is greatly to our reproach that we ſo wretchedly improve our invaluable privileges.

The HISTORY of the CHURCH of SCOTLAND.

PART II.

CHAP. I.

Of the riſing at Bothwell, and the attempts made againſt Lauderdale.

FROM what has been related in the former part, we may eaſily form a judgment of the diſmal ſtate of the nation on account of the arbitrary proceedings of thoſe who had the management of affairs, and the unaccountable ſeverities which many innocent people endured.

The rigorous and military execution of the ſanguinary laws, now in force, could not but exaſperate thoſe who were by this means robbed of their liberties and properties, and of every thing that was dear and valuable, eſpecially, as oppreſſions of every kind were ſtill increaſing. All legal methods of redreſs were cut off from the poor ſuffering people. What then could they do? Surely one might think, that it was incumbent upon them to fall upon meaſures for getting from under the feet of their cruel oppreſſors: for who would chuſe to continue in miſery, if they could, by any lawful and juſtifiable method, extricate themſelves from it? They were moſt averſe to take arms, until they were forced to take it in their own defence. And though they were obliged to have recourſe to this expedient, yet they never deſired to have an opportunity of making uſe of it; but, being declared rebels on this account, they were conſtrained to perſevere in it, till the fury of the perſecutors drove them to the riſing I am now to give an account of.

It has been already obſerved, That, when they found that ſmall meetings were more expoſed to danger than greater aſſemblies, they altered their method, and reſolved to aſſemble in one meeting, in thoſe places which they apprehended ſtood in moſt need of the goſpel, and where they might meet together in greater ſafety. They who thus aſſembled were generally thoſe who were averſe to the indulgence, and the accepters of it; and many came to it armed. The orders given to the ſoldiers, and the ſevere laws made on account of the primate's death, tended to increaſe their numbers; but the diviſions occaſioned by the unhappy indulgence were of great diſadvantage to them, and at laſt proved their ruin. I need not here repeat what has been already ſaid on this point.

When the numbers of the perſecuted party were conſiderably augmented, Mr Robert Hamilton, brother to the laird of Preſtoun, and ſome others, moved that ſomething might be done as a teſtimony againſt the iniquity of the times. Accordingly, after ſerious conſideration and prayer, they reſolved to continue to hear the goſpel, notwithſtanding all the dangers to which they might be expoſed, and to publiſh to the world their teſtimony to the truth and cauſe which they owned, and againſt the ſins and defections of the times. In conſequence of this reſolution, the ſaid Mr Hamilton, Mr Thomas Douglas one of their preachers, and about 80 armed men, were pitched upon to go to ſome public place to publiſh their declaration, and burn the papers mentioned in it. They judged that the 29th of May was the moſt proper time for putting this in execution. Accordingly, the afternoon of that day, they came to Rutherglen, a ſmall royal burgh two miles from Glaſgow, where they extinguiſhed the bonefires, put their reſolution in practice, and affixed a copy of their declaration to the market-croſs; the following is according to the copy thereof ſubjoined to the informatory vindication.

The declaration and teſtimony of ſome of the true Preſbyterian party in Scotland, publiſhed at Rutherglen, 29th May 1679.

AS the Lord hath been pleaſed ſtill to keep and preſerve his intereſt in this land, by the teſtimonies of ſome faithful witneſſes from the beginning; ſo, in our day, ſome have not been wanting, who, through the greateſt hazards, have added their teſtimony to thoſe who have gone before them, by ſuffering death, baniſhment, torturings, forfeitures, impriſonments, and what not, from a perfidious and cruel adverſary, to the church and kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt in the land: therefore we, owning the ſame intereſt of Chriſt, according to the word of the Lord, and the national and ſolemn league and covenant, deſire to add our teſtimony to the teſtimonies of the worthies that have gone before us (though we be unworthy, yet hoping we are true members of the church of Scotland) and that againſt all things done prejudicial to his intereſt, from the beginning of the work of reformation, eſpecially from 1648 to 1660, but more particularly from the ſaid year 1660, and downwards, againſt the acts following. As againſt the act of ſupremacy, the declaration whereby our covenants were condemned; the act for the everſion of the eſtabliſhed government of the church, and for eſtabliſhing of abjured prelacy; the act reciſſory of all acts of parliaments and aſſemblies for eſtabliſhing the government of the church according to the word; the act of Glaſgow putting the ſame in in execution, whereby, at one time, were violently caſt out above three hundred miniſters, without any legal procedure; likewiſe the act for appointing an holy anniverſary day to be kept every 29th of May, for giving thanks for the ſetting up of an uſurped power, deſtroying the intereſt of Chriſt in the land, whereby the creature is ſet up to be worſhipped in the room of our great Redeemer, and a power is aſſumed which is proper to the Lord only; for the appointing of ordinances in his church, as particularly the government thereof and the keeping of holy days belongeth to no prince, prelate, nor perſon on earth, but only to our Lord Redeemer. And farther, we give our teſtimony againſt all ſinful and unlawful acts, emitted and executed, publiſhed and proſecuted by them againſt our covenanted reformation. And, for confirmation of this our teſtimony, we do here this day, being the 29th of May 1679, publicly, and moſt juſtly, burn the foreſaid act at this croſs of Rutherglen, being the chief burgh of the nether-ward of Clydeſdale, as they perfidiouſly and blaſphemouſly have burnt our holy covenants through ſeveral cities of theſe covenanted kingdoms. We hope none will take exception at our not ſubſcribing this our teſtimony, being ſo ſolemnly given; for we are ready to do it, if neceſſary, and to ſubſcribe it with all our faithful ſuffering brethren in the land.

When this declaration was publiſhed, Mr Hamilton and the reſt retired from Rutherglen towards Evandale and Newmills. This affair made a great noiſe both at Glaſgow and Edinburgh. Mr Graham of Claverhouſe (afterwards viſcount of Dundee) having unlimited powers to kill and deſtroy all he found in arms, came ſuddenly upon the town of Hamilton on Saturday afternoon the 31ſt of May, and in that neighbourhood ſeized Mr John King, and about 14 others, who were not in arms, nor had any thing laid to their charge. They who eſcaped, and ſome who joined them in order to reſcue Mr King, repaired to the meeting, which they heard was to be at Loudonhill next day, expecting aſſiſtance from them.

Mean while Claverhouſe having likewiſe intelligence of that meeting, and reſolving to diſperſe them, marched early from Hamilton on Sabbath-morning the firſt of June, and carried his priſoners with him bound two and two, his men driving them before them like ſo many ſheep. Public worſhip was begun by Mr Douglas, when they were informed of Claverhouſe's approach. Wherefore all who were armed reſolved to leave the meeting, face the ſoldiers, and if poſſible, relieve the priſoners. Accordingly, about 40 horſe, and 150 or 200 foot came up with Claverhouſe and his party near Drumclog, and after a ſhort and cloſe engagement defeated Claverhouſe, and reſcued the priſoners. Claverhouſe had his horſe ſhot under him, and narrowly eſcaped; above 20 of the ſoldiers were killed, and ſeveral taken priſoners, whom they releaſed upon their being diſarmed. The countrymen loſt not above two or three. One John Mortoun was killed; Thomas Weir and William Dalziel (which laſt was concerned in the biſhop's death) died in a few days of their wounds.

The country people, after this action, reſolved, ſince they could not ſeparate without evident hazard, to keep together till they ſaw how matters would turn out. Mr Hamilton marched that night to Hamilton, and Claverhouſe eſcaped to Glaſgow, and alarmed the ſoldiers there. Next day Mr Hamilton, and thoſe who joined them in their march, being too much fluſhed with their ſucceſs, marched to Glaſgow, and entered the town about ten o'clock; but after ſix or eight were killed, among whom was one Walter Paterſon a pious youth in the pariſh of Cambuſnethan, and two or three wounded, they were obliged to quit the place, and retire to Hamilton, where they pitched a ſort of camp.

Such was the inhumanity of the ſoldiers, that the dead bodies which were left in the ſtreet were for ſome time not permitted to be buried. Some papers ſay, That Claverhouſe and ſome of the officers gave orders that none ſhould bury them, but that the butchers dogs ſhould be ſuffered to eat them. But, be that as it will, it is certain that 7 dead bodies lay in the ſtreet from 11 in the forenoon till night; and when they were taken into houſes to be dreſſed for their burial, the ſoldiers came and ſtript them of their dead-clothes; nay, when they permitted them to be buried, none durſt appear to perform this ſervice but women, whom, notwithſtanding, the ſoldiers attacked, and cut the paſſes with their ſwords: and when the women uſed their plaids for paſſs, the ſoldiers took their plaids from them. In ſhort, they were obliged to ſet the coffins in the ſtone-houſes, near the High church, where they continued till the ſoldiers left Glaſgow.

Early on the third of June the council met, and, having received a falſe account of thoſe tranſactions, iſſued a proclamation againſt the rebels, as they called them, wherein, after aggravating the riſing, they ſay, That a party of diſloyal perſons, who had formerly taſted of royal bounty and clemency, [viz. the finings, impriſonings, intercommuning, baniſhments, &c. mentioned in the former part of this hiſtory] had come to Rutherglen, and proclaimed their rebellious covenant, and had committed a great many outrages, &c. And therefore all perſons in arms were charged to lay down their arms, and ſurrender themſelves to the earl of Linlithgow, or any other officer or magiſtrate, within the ſpace of 24 hours after the publication of this proclamation, or elſe to be treated as traitors, and rendered incapable of mercy [but there was no promiſe of pardon.] In ſhort, all maſters of families, heritors, &c. were required to be careful, leſt any of their children, ſervants, or tenants join the rebels, or elſe they were to be looked upon as diſaffected perſons. We ſhall relate how the ſoldiers improved this clauſe after Bothwel. The reader is to judge whether they who were now in arms had any encouragement to ſurrender. The ſame day they wrote to Lauderdale an account of theſe things.

Then the council iſſued a proclamation ordering the militia to rend zvous, and to join and act with the regular forces, under ſevere penalties; and another ordering all the heritors and freeholders to attend the king's hoſt; and made all preparations they judged neceſſary for ſuppreſſing the rebellion, as it was termed. I ſhall only obſerve, that all, or moſt of the officers, named for this hoſt, were violent perſecutors of the preſbyterians, many of whom had a warm ſide to popery, and ſome were profeſſed papiſts. But to return to the affairs of the weſt.

On the third of June, Lord Rois, and the officers in Glaſgow, finding that the gathering of the country people ſtill increaſed, marched with the forces to Kilſyth, and carried with them, in carts, ſome of the wounded countrymen who fell into their hands, and about the firſt were joined by the earl of Linlithgow at Larbertmuir; but, being falſely informed that the weſt country army was 8000 ſtrong, they wrote to the council, that it was the general ſenſe of the officers, that his majeſty ſhould be applied to for aſſiſtance from England. The council required them to march to Edinburgh, and ſent orders to the governor of Stirling to take ſpecial care of that city, and at the ſame time wrote to Lauderdale an account of their proceedings, and required help from England. On the 7th of June the army was cantoned about Edinburgh, where they continued till the 16th.

Mean while matters were ſo managed at court, that the duke of Monmouth and Buccleugh was pitched upon to command an army for ſuppreſſing this inſurrection. When the council received the news of this, they, on the 15th, wrote to court, and propoſed that Dalziel might be made lieutenant general under the duke.

About the middle of this month, lord MacDonald, a profeſſed papiſt, and the MacLeans, having for ſome time ravaged the lands of the earl of Argyll, ſent a petition to the council, offering their ſervice in ſuppreſſing the rebels in the weſt, whoſe addreſſes, ſay they, we have rejected, and praying that the earl of Argyll might be required, in the mean time, to deſiſt, &c. The inſinuation, that the weſt country people had addreſſed them, needs no confutation; for they who oppoſed prelacy could never encourage popery. But it was generally believed that this army of profeſſed papiſts, now in arms, though they falſely pretended ſelf-defence againſt the earl of Argyll, were yet in cloſe correſpondence with, if not under penſion to the duke of York, and in concert with thoſe concerned in the popiſh plot in England. But if this was not the caſe, yet how unaccountable it was, that the council ſhould remove give a petition from the commander of this popiſh party, when all papiſts in arms were by a late proclamation, declared to be guilty of treaſon, muſt be left with the reader; eſpecially as it was with difficulty that they were not employed in acting againſt the weſt-country army, of whom we were now to ſpeak.

The ſucceſs they met with at Drumclog, and the retiring of the forces from Glaſgow, gave opportunity to many to join them from all quarters, conſidering the neceſſity there was to aſſiſt them in this extremity, and that themſelves were liable to the ſame common danger from their enraged enemies. They were likeways convinced of the righteouſneſs of the cauſe in which they were engaged, and that, if they ſhould be made a ſacrifice to the rage of their perſecutors, they would be accountable for their blood, did they withhold their help. From theſe conſiderations many came from Galloway and Nithſdale, from Carrick, Kyle, Cuningham, Renfrew, Lanerk, the Lothians, and Stirling-ſhire; and among them were ſome gentlemen of note.

The author of the memoirs of North Britain, printed at London 1715, ſays, 'I know very well that inſurrection is repreſented as a rigorous tumult of a few factious enthuſiaſts; but it is moſt certain that ſeveral gentlemen of note engaged in that buſineſs, the tyranny of the Tories being become intolerable.' And therefore, though biſhop Burnet vindicates the non-conformiſts from having formed any deſign of rebellion before this, yet he was miſinformed when he ſays, 'That none came into this attempt but thoſe deſperate intercommuned men, who were, as it were, hunted from their houſes into all thoſe extravagancies that men may fall in who wander about inflaming one another, and are heated in it with falſe notions of religion.' Such invidious reflections are no more than what might be expected from the pen of a prelate on this ſubject, for I can ſee no extravagancies they fell into but what was the natural effect of the oppreſſion of the managers, and there were a great many gentlemen that joined them, and many more who favoured their deſign.

There were likewiſe ſeveral miniſters among them, as Meſſ. John Welſh, John King, John Kid, William Fo ſter, Thomas Douglas, Samuel Arnot, John Rae, George Barclay, John Semple, &c. They never, as Mr Wodrow thinks exceeded 4000, though Echard would have them to be 17,000, when they were routed at Bothwell; but then many were but ill-armed, and it was their loſs that they had no officers who underſtood the art of war.

When the king's forces left Glaſgow, Mr Welſh and ſeveral others came hither from Carrick, and interred the bodies of thoſe who had been killed in the late attempt, together with the heads of the ſufferers for Pentland. They ſhewed the like kindneſs to the heads and hands of thoſe which had been ſet up at Kilmarnock, Irvine and Ayr, and were well received by the good people every where; but the diviſions that broke out among them occaſioned the defeat of their deſigns at this time.

The principal thing they had in view was to publiſh a declaration to the world, ſhewing the reaſons of their conduct. Mr Hamilton who took upon him the command, Mr Douglas and Mr Cargil, &c. were of opinion that the indulgence ſhould be condemned; but this was oppoſed by Mr Welſh, the laird of Kaitlock, and others; but Mr Hamilton and his adherents being more numerous, the following general declaration was agreed to by the majority.

'We who are here providentially convened in our own defence, for preventing and removing the miſtakes and miſapprehenſions of all, eſpecially of thoſe whom we wiſh to be, and hope are friends, do declare our preſent purpoſes and endeavours to be only in vindication and defence of the true reformed religion in its profeſſion and doctrine, as we ſtand obliged thereunto by our national and ſolemn league and covenants, and that ſolemn acknowledgment of ſins, and engagement to duties made and taken in the year 1648, declaring againſt popery, prelacy, eraſtianiſm, and all things depending thereupon.

When the army increaſed, there were ſeveral who found fault with the laſt clauſe of the above declaration, becauſe it comprehended the indulgence, and therefore moved that it might be taken out; they ſaid that nothing ſhould be in the declaration that had a tendency to exclude any preſbyterians from joining in their aſſiſtance, eſpecially as the indulgence, in its own nature diſputable, had not yet been declared ſinful by any general aſſembly, or other competent judge. On the other hand it was argued, that the point controverted was only declared againſt in general terms; that eraſtianiſm was as expreſly abjured by this church as prelacy: and that the indulgence was the fruit of eraſtianiſm. The debates were carried to a great length.

At another meeting Mr Hamilton, and thoſe of his ſentiments, moved that they might obſerve a day of faſting and humiliation before they ſhould be engaged with the enemy; but they who oppoſed a teſtimony againſt the indulgence did not reliſh this motion, unleſs, ſuch grounds of faſting ſhould be given as they all could agree in. However, they were at this time over ruled, and a committee was appointed, conſiſting of four miniſters and four gentlemen, to draw up ſome cauſes of faſting and humiliation. Accordingly they referred to what was written in the cauſes of God's wrath, and then mentioned, 1. The extravagant rejoicing at the reſtoration. 2. The eſtabliſhing of prelacy. 3. The neglecting of public teſtimonies againſt that abjured hierarchy. 4. The ſin of many in taking unlawful bonds. 5. The paying of unlawful ceſs, &c. for ſupporting the ſupremacy and ſuppreſſing the goſpel. 6. The complying with abjured eraſtianiſm in the matter of the indulgence. They who were of different ſentiments from Mr Hamilton would not come into thoſe things as proper to be laid down as cauſes of humiliation, and ſo no faſt was kept. And thus diviſions broke this little army before they were broken by the enemy.

When the cauſe of their appearing and continuing in arms came to be conſidered at a meeting of their officers, which they called a council of war, Mr Hamilton and his adherents were for having it ſtated upon the footing of the Rutherglen declaration; but they who favoured the indulgence propoſed that the king's authority ſhould be expreſly owned, according to the 3d article of the ſolemn league and covenant. Againſt this it was argued, that, as they had made no declaration againſt him, ſo they muſt be excuſed, and not urged to declare poſitively for him, eſpecially as he was now in a ſtated oppoſition to the intereſt of Chriſt, and had, upon the matter, declared war againſt his people, and all the preſent oppoſition cruelty and perſecution in Scotland, for redreſs of which they were now appearing, were carried on in his name. The covenants, they ſaid, only bound them to him in the preſervation and defence of the true religion, and the liberties of the kingdoms: but the king had actually overturned the true religion, ſet up prelacy and eraſtianiſm, ruined the covenanted work of reformation, invaded the liberties of the kingdom, perſecuted to the death the aſſerters of both, and plainly broke the conditions of government ſworn at his coronation. To this it is anſwered, That, in 1638, the aſſembly and covenanters owned the king's authority though he had declared war againſt them. That this method of throwing off the king's authority would obſtruct the redreſs of their grievances, and fruſtrate the deſign of their appearance. But here the reader muſt obſerve, that Mr Hamilton and his adherents propoſed no declaration againſt the king's lawful authority, only would not poſitively mention him or his intereſt in the declaration: and it is certain that what they aſſerted, concerning the king's oppoſition to the true religion, &c. was fact. How far their inference was juſt muſt be left with the reader. However, they who oppoſed Mr Hamilton and his adherents ſo far prevailed, as on the 13th of June to get a declaration publiſhed at Glaſgow, called the Hamilton declaration, wherein the king's intereſt is expreſly aſſerted. The reader may eaſily ſee that this little army muſt have laboured under great diſadvantages from their diviſions when the enemy was coming upon them.

As they had been ſome days about Hamilton, ſo it will be proper to return to the king's army.

We have heard that the army under the command of the earl of Linlithgow was cantoned about Edinburgh, and on the 17th they were at Kirkhill park belonging to Cardross, who suffered much at this time by the soldiers.

On the 18th the duke of Buccleugh, and Monmouth came to Edinburgh, and was admitted a privy-counsellor. The author of the memoirs of north Britain, formerly quoted, says, 'That the Tories in England perswaded the king to send his grace against those unfortunate people to make him odious to the protestant party in both kingdoms, who wished well to all endeavours for preservation of the protestant religion, their rights and privileges.'

This same day the council wrote to Lauderdale acquainting him of the duke's arrival, and thanking his majesty for sending him.

On the 19th the duke went to the army, but marched slowly towards Hamilton. Next day he sent to the council, complaining that their march was retarded for want of provisions, which were accordingly sent to him. But some think the reasons of his grace's slow motions was, because he expected some application to be made to him by those now in arms.

On the 20th the council received a letter from the king approving of their proceedings, and requiring that they would prosecute the rebels with fire and sword, and all other extremities of war. These were orders our managers were ready enough to obey; accordingly they transmitted a copy of his majesty's letter to the duke, whose army then lay within two miles of the kirk of Shots and was about ten thousand strong, which was more than twice the number of those they had to deal with.

There were, at this time, pains taken to dispose those in arms to lay before the duke their grievances, with professions of loyalty to the king; but their disorders still increasing did a great deal of damage, for the time of action approached, and their numbers decreased before the king's army came up. When they heard of Monmouth's arrival, a motion was made to model their army, and pitch upon such officers as were best skilled in military affairs. About this time a person unknown came into one of their meetings with a paper, as he said, from some ministers and others, which they earnestly desired all might sign. The tenor of it was, 'We the officers of the presbyterian army do hereby declare, That we have no intention or design to overturn the government, civil or ecclesiastical, whereunto we are solemnly sworn by our national and solemn league and covenant; and that it is our judgment and opinion that all matters now in controversy be foreborn and referred to be determined by their proper judicatories, viz. a free and unlimited parliament, and a lawful general assembly.' But both these proposals were dropt for a time.

On Saturday the 21st the officers met, when those who were not of the sentiments of Mr Hamilton and his adherents were most numerous, and their debates ran higher than ever, though the king's forces were almost in view. At this meeting it was urged that all places in the army should be declared vacant, and officers harmoniously chosen, that so they might be entirely united in the time of action. Mr Hamilton and those of his way of thinking declared their willingness on condition of the right stating of the quarrel. Upon this the indulgence was again brought upon the carpit, and the dispute was carried to such a pitch, that Mr Hamilton, John Paton, Wil. Carmichael, And. Turnbull, &c. left the meeting. They who remained chosed a new preces and clerk, and entered upon business; but were unwilling to nominate officers when so many had withdrawn. However, being acquainted with Monmouth's willingness to receive application from them, and that being an affair which could admit of no delay, they unanimously voted a supplication to his grace, wherein, after giving a general account of their grievances, they prayed that some of their number might have liberty, under safe conduct, to come and lay before him their grievances and requests.

On Sabbath the 22d the duke and his army were come to Bothwell muir and their advanced guards to Bothwell-town within a quarter of a mile from the bridge. The countrymen lay encamped on the south of the river Clyde in Hamilton-muir, and had an advanced party ready to dispute the passage at Bothwell-bridge, if the king's army should attempt it. Early that morning Mr David Hume, the laird of Kaitloch, and some say Mr John Welsh in disguise went to the duke with the supplication. They had easy access, and besides the supplication, prayed, That they might be allowed the free exercise of religion, and to attend gospel-ordinances dispensed by their own faithful presbyterian ministers without molestation: that a free parliament and a free general assembly, without the clogs of oaths and declarations, should be allowed to meet for settling affairs both in church and state; and that all those who now are or have been in arms should be indemnified.' The duke heard them patiently, but refused to treat with them till they had laid down their arms and submitted to the king's mercy. He sent them back to their friends, and ordered them to bring an answer in half an hour at farthest. In short, when the commissioners came to the army, they renewed their debates, and so no answer was returned.

The king's troops in the mean time had free liberty to plant their canon, and lord Livingston began the attack on the bridge with the foot guards, the countrymen stood their ground near an hour, and defended the bridge with much gallantry. Hackstoun of Rathillet, one of their commanders, shewed a great deal of bravery upon this occasion; but their ammunition failing them, and not being properly supported, they were obliged to quit the bridge where their main strength lay. Upon this the duke ordered the whole army to pass the bridge with the canon before them, and soon after the whole west country army was routed.

Thus the rebellion at Bothwell, as it was called, was suppressed. From this I cannot but observe, that the righteousness of a cause is not to be concluded because it is not always successful. It is plain those people rose in defence of their religion and liberties. A better cause none could be engaged in, and yet they were defeated. Again, though their appearance had been called rebellion, yet every one, who has just sentiments of liberty and law, must view it in another light. We have observed, that the constitution of the government was overturned, perjury, violence and oppression were established, and those very people put from under the protection of the law, and exposed to bonds, imprisonments, banishments, ravages and plunderings. And though they did rise in arms, and declare against the civil and religious oppressions then established by authority, yet they never did declare against the oppressors. It is true, though several of them would not take the king's interest into the state of the quarrel, yet they did not declare against him. I shall only add, that had they been successful, so as to have restored the civil and religious liberties of their country, all good men would have honoured their memory; and as it was, they deserved to be had in great reputation. Let rebellious Jacobites call this rising rebellion, none who own the glorious revolution, and the protestant succession in the house of Hanover, can esteem it so. The chief thing in which these patriots were to blame, was their making this attempt without some greater probability of success than for ought appears, they had at that time. But as matters then stood the division of the indulgence ruined this attempt. It is certain they who were for bearing their testimony against it acted according to the principles of the presbyterians. Happy had it been for the nation had it never been complied with, especially by so many worthy and godly ministers.

There cannot be any just account given of the number of the slain, because they were murdered up and down the fields as the soldiers met them. It was reckoned 400 were killed, and 1200 surrendered prisoners on the muir, who were not only disarmed and stripped almost naked, but made to ly flat down on the ground, and not suffered to change that posture. And if any of them did so much as raise himself a little, he was shot dead in an instant. There had been a much greater slaughter had it not been for the duke, and the interest of several noblemen and gentlemen at that time with his grace. Nevertheless great were the severities used by the soldiers, of which which the following are glaring inſtances. Mr William Gordon of Earlſtoun, having his affairs to ſettle, could not join the country army, but ſent his ſon Mr Alexander before, who was in the action. Mr William not knowing of the diſaſter of the weſt-country army, and riding as quickly as he could to join them, was met by a party of Engliſh dragoons, and refuſing to ſurrender was killed on the ſpot. His friends could not get him buried with the reſt of his family, and therefore he lies interred in the churchyard of Glaſſerton. A pillar was erected over his grave, but no inſcription was ſuffered to be upon it. Mr Alexander Gordon, one of the predeceſſors of this ancient family, entertained the diſciples of the great Wickliff, and had a New Teſtament in the vulgar tongue, which they uſed to read in meetings in the woods near the Airds. Mr Afterwards Sir Alexander Gordon, the preſent Sir Thomas's father, narrowly eſcaped at this time, by means of one of his tenants, who, knowing him as he rode through Hamilton after the defeat, made him diſmount, put his horſe furniture into a dunghill, and obliged him to put on woman's clothes and rock the cradle, by which means he was preſerved. We ſhall hear more of him afterwards.

Several were murdered in cold blood by the ſoldiers, that ſame day, on the road near Hamilton. They were going to hear ſermon in the camp, not knowing that the ſoldiers had got over the river, particularly James Scoullar and Gavin Semple in the pariſh of Glaſsford, John Browning, Rob. Strobo, William Hamilton, Rob. Steil, Wil. Pate and Arch. Dick, all of the pariſh of Evandale, and Rob. Finlay in that of Stonehouſe, though they had no arms. Next day Arthur Inglis in Cambuſnethan, reading his Bible in a furrow, was looked upon as a Whig by the ſoldiers who happened to perceive him, and therefore one of them fired at a diſtance, but miſſed him. The good man looked about, and not offering to move, the ſoldiers came and clave him through the ſcull, and ſo diſpatched him; and indeed they ſcarcely ſpared any they met with near the field of battle.

Dreadful were the conſequences of this fatal action, and had it not been for Monmouth's lenity, they had been much greater; for ſome of the officers propoſed to burn Glaſgow, Hamilton and the country round Bothwellbridge; but the general rejected the motion with indignation. We ſhall hear that moſt of the gentlemen in the weſtern ſhires were brought to inexpreſſible trouble. I ſhall only now mention the caſe of Sir Thomas Stuart of Coltneſs, ſon to Sir James Stuart late provoſt of Edinburgh. He was obliged firſt to abſcond, and then retire to Holland, orders being iſſued for apprehending him, though neither he nor any of his ſervants were there.

Dalziel's commiſſion to be lieutenant general came down on the day of battle. The laird of Lundin brought the firſt news of the action to the council, who immediately ſent diſpatches to Lauderdale, and wrote to col. Struthers in Northumberland to ſecure the borders, ſtop and impriſon the rebels, and gave orders where they thought it proper to accompliſh this end; but theſe things I omit being no more than what might have been expected.

The priſoners taken at Bothwell were this day brought into Edinburgh, among whom was Mr John Kid. In their journey they were generally tied two and two, made a gazing ſtock in the places through which they paſſed, and expoſed to the cruel mockings of the profane, who ſaid, Where is now your God? Take him up now, and Mr Welſh who ſaid you ſhould win the day; though Mr Welſh never ſaid any ſuch thing. When they came to Edinburgh, the council ordered the magiſtrates to put them into the inner Gray-friars church-yard, with proper centinels over them, viz. 24 to guard them at night, and 8 in the day time. The officers were to keep a liſt of the centinels, that, if any of the priſoners ſhould eſcape, the centinels ſhould throw the dice and anſwer body for body. The officers were to be accountable for the centinels, and the town of Edinburgh for the officers. Theſe orders were put in execution, and the priſoners were all carried to the place appointed, except a few who were put in priſon, and continued in that incloſure near five months, moſtly in the open air. Here they generally ſtood all day, and lay all night on the cold ground without any other accommodation; and if any of them, in the night time, had raiſed their head for a little eaſe, the ſoldiers were ſure to fire at them. It would be endleſs to recount all their hardſhips, and with what difficulty perſons were allowed to bring them any neceſſary proviſions; how the women were inſulted and abuſed by the ſoldiers, for no man had acceſs. It was eſteemed a ſingular favour that ſome huts made of dales were ſet up for them a few weeks before they were brought out of this place.

On the 25th, having had an account from the general of his having ſent parties in queſt of the rebels whom he looked upon as diſperſed, the council ordered Henry Ker of Graden to ſearch for Turnbull of Bowly, Turnbull of Sandyhill, Henry Hall, and Mr Archbald Riddel, as being either at or acceſſory to the rebellion; and next day they publiſhed a proclamation againſt the rebels, as they called them. Many names were inſerted in this proclamation, and among others Mr John King. The two brothers of the earl of Galloway were named in the proclamation, but the council afterwards declared thoſe two had made it appear that they were not in the rebellion.

This proclamation made way for the ſoldiers to commit many cruelties up and down the country. A great many parties were diſperſed through the weſt and ſouth; but none were ſo noted for their barbarities as Claverhouſe and thoſe under his command. Accordingly, upon any frivolous information, they attacked the houſes of thoſe whom they pretended had been in the riſing, eſpecially through the ſhire of Ayr, which had ſuffered ſo much the laſt year by the Highland boſt. The reader will be able to judge what diſtreſs that part of the country was in by a few inſtances.

William MacLeweyand, in the pariſh of Bar, had been at Bothwell; his wife got liberty to have him releaſed from the Gray friars church-yard; but, as they were returning home, Claverhouſe came with his troop to this man's houſe, and rifled it of every thing; and during the reſt of this perſecuting period they ſuffered many ſuch plunderings, which I have not room to mention. James MacJarrow, in the ſame pariſh, though he was not at Bothwell, ſuffered much in the ſame manner.

Claverhouſe, marching into Galloway with ſome Engliſh dragoons, &c. ſcarcely made any diſtinction between thoſe who had been at Bothwell, and others, ſeized all the horſes they could find, plundered the houſes, particularly in the pariſhes of Carſphairn, Balmaclellan and Glencairn. In one houſe in Balmaclellan they forced a woman before her huſband, and then pillaged the houſe. In the pariſh of Glencairn, in order to oblige a poor harmleſs youth to tell who of his neighbours were at Bothwell, they tied a ſmall cord round his head, then faſtened the two ends of it about the butt of one of their piſtols, and twiſted it ſo hard, that the fleſh was cut round into the ſcull. In the ſame pariſh they ſeized a poor ſhepherd boy, and, to force him to diſcover his maſter, faſtened two cords to his thumbs, and by theſe hanged him up to the roof of the houſe. Mary Gordon of Robertoun ſuffered much by frequent quarterings of ſoldiers, who took away her horſes, and plundered her houſe. In a ſhort time after they returned, and carried her and her only ſon John Gordon, a boy, to priſon together, with two of her ſervants, who were both tranſported to America. She and her ſon continued ſome time in hold to their great loſs. Her tenants were ſadly oppreſſed for her ſake. One of them, John Sprat, was plundered, and fined in 20 l. for ſpeaking to his own ſon who had been at Bothwell.

Other ſhires were not exempted. Francis Park, in the pariſh of Carmonnock, had 14 ſoldiers quartered upon him, and was obliged to give 50 l. to ſave his houſe from being plundered, becauſe he had lent his plough to a neighbour of his who had been at Bothwel. George Park in the ſame pariſh, was forced to give 200 merks for harbouring his own ſon, who had been in the riſing. John Mitchel's wife, in the pariſh of Cathcart near Glaſgow, had lighted matches put between her fingers to force her to diſcover her huſband, and, when the ſoldiers found they could not prevail, they rifled the houſe, and deſtroyed the proviſions. I ſhall leave the reader to make reflections on theſe things.

On the 4th of July the council wrote to the sheriffs on the south of the Tay, to send up exact lists of the heritors who did not attend the king's host, or who left it without permission. This occasioned many to suffer, as we shall relate next year. At the same time they received a letter from the king, dated the 29th of June, concerning the prisoners, in which his majesty was graciously pleased to require the council to examine such of them as they thought could best discover the rise and progress of the late rebellion, and what correspondence the rebels had especially with the kingdom of England, and to offer them pardon upon making out their discoveries, but to put them to the torture if they refused to inform in what the council had reason to believe they knew. His majesty approved of their sending 3 or 400 of them to the plantations, and ordered the ringleaders to be prosecuted as traitors, and the rest to be set at liberty upon their enacting themselves not to take arms against the king or his authority.

Together with this letter a proclamation came down of the same date, of which I must give the following abstract, as this was the foundation of the third indulgence. 'We having—past so many acts, in favour of the protestant religion, against field conventicles, whereby our subjects were withdrawn from public ordinances, in such ways as exposed them to hear Jesuits, or any other irregular preachers, and were at last debauched to meet in arms in formed rebellions—We have therefore thought fit—to recommend the vigorous execution of all our former laws—against such rendezvouses of rebellion.—As also, we most peremptorily command all in office under us, to prosecute, with all legal rigour, those inhuman and execrable murderers of the late archbishop of St Andrews, and all such as have had accession thereto.—But we being desirous to reclaim all such—as have been misled by ignorance or blind zeal,—and to convince all indifferent persons that too great severity is as far from our design as our inclination, have, according to the power reserved to us by—our second parliament, suspended the execution of all laws and acts against such as frequent house conventicles in the low countries on the south side of the Tay only, excepting Edinburgh and two miles round, the lordships of Musselburgh and Dalkeith, the cities of St Andrews, Glasgow and Stirling, and a mile round each.—And—we hereby suspend all diligences for fines, upon the account of conventicles, except such fines as are imposed by our privy-council, and such—as were—transacted for prior to the 29th of May last. But—we hereby ordain all such as shall be suffered to preach to have their names given in, and surety found to our privy-council for their peaceable behaviour, only one preacher being allowed to a parish, and none to be allowed who have appeared against us in the late rebellion, nor none who shall be admitted by the unconform ministers in any time hereafter; assuring all those to whom we have extended this favour, that if they, or any of them, shall, for the future frequent any field-conventicles, or disturb the peace of these our kingdoms, we will secure our people and maintain our authority.—This our forbearance being to continue in force only during our royal pleasure.'

It is in this proclamation alledged, that they who frequented field meetings were exposed to hear Jesuits. Whether this be not a most vile innuendo must be left with the reader. Though my author says, That the favour here granted to the ministers was one of the least clogged favours that had been granted to the presbyterians since the restoration, yet I cannot but think it impossible for those who had the management of affairs in this period to grant a favour without a clog. I shall not therefore compare this with the former two indulgences, but shall leave it with the reader, whether they who exercised their ministry, in consequence of this, did not virtually acknowlege the wickedness of field conventicles, of the late appearance in arms in defence of religion and liberty, nay, and the justice of the laws then made against the brethren. However, it was certainly some favour to be excused from the rigorous execution of those wicked laws then in force, though the condition of it was a burden to many tender consciences. But, such as it was, it is likely that it would not have been granted had it not been for the interest of the duke of Monmouth; and, in consequence of it, the council ordered the magistrates of Edinburgh to release Mess. John Mosman, Archd. MacLean, James Frothie, Will. Kyle, Robert Fleming, Fran. Irvine, and Tho. Wilkie, upon their engaging to live peaceably, and not to preach at field conventicles. The ministers in the Bass were likewise sent for to be set at liberty upon the same terms.

The same day the council, in obedience to his majesty's letter, agreed that so many of the prisoners (except the ringleaders) as would oblige themselves not to take arms against the king or his authority, should be released; and ordered intimation to be made, that if they, or any of them, shall afterwards be found in arms at field-conventicles, they shall forfeit the benefit of the indemnity. Accordingly the following bond was drawn up to be subscribed by the Bothwell prisoners. 'I—being apprehended for being at the late rebellion; and whereas the lords of his majesty's privy-council, in pursuance of his majesty's command, have ordained me to be set at liberty, I enacting myself to the effect underwritten; therefore I bind, oblige and enact myself, in the books of the privy council, that hereafter I shall not take up arms without or against his majesty or his authority. As witness my hand.' &c. It is plain that they who signed this bond acknowleged that the rising at Bothwell was rebellion, and obliged themselves against defensive arms for the future; and therefore it is no wonder though many stood out, and refused to accept deliverance upon terms they thought not only contradicted their principles, but also trampled upon the blood of their brethren who died in the cause.

About this time the duke of Buccleugh and Monmouth published a pardon and indemnity to all tenants and subtenants who had been at Bothwell, in case they submitted themselves against such a day. There was likewise a bond required of the heritors in the west-country, obliging themselves to use their utmost for securing those who did not accept of this favour. But as few of the tenants chused to venture themselves into the hands of the magistrates at that time, so the heritors chiefly concerned refused the bond. On the 6th the duke took his leave of the council, and in two or three days returned to England.

On the 11th of July the council received a letter from Lauderdale, signifying, 'That the king was informed of an infamous libel wrote and dispersed at Edinburgh, printed and dispersed at London, and cried in the streets, reflecting on the proceedings of the lords of council and session; that the king orders a diligent inquiry where and by whom the copies were written out and dispersed at Edinburgh, the accounts at London bearing, That they were written in the chamber of James Hay writer, who married a niece of Sir Arch. Primrose. The council appointed a committee to examine into this affair, and wrote a letter of thanks to the king for his concern for them. That the reader may know the rise of this, he will remember that Lauderdale's administration had been blamed by many as oppressive, and subversive of the liberties and properties of the subject, and that several attempts had been formerly made in vain to get him set aside; nevertheless as such a brave struggle was at this time making in England against popery and arbitrary power, and as Lauderdale was as disagreeable there as he was to many in Scotland, so several resolved to renew their attempt against him.

Accordingly duke Hamilton repaired to court in the spring, and soon after was followed by the marquis of Athol, Sir John Cochran, and others; together with these two eminent lawyers, Sir George Lockhart and John Cuningham, with an intent to renew their accusations against Lauderdale. The king's advocate went upon the other side. Bishop Burnet says he was sent for to defend the administration. On the 29th of May the commons of England presented another address to the king, intreating his majesty to remove the duke of Lauderdale from his council and presence for ever.

When duke Hamilton and the rest got access to the king, they laid before him their grievances, which were printed under the following title, Some particular matters of fact relating to the administration of affairs in Scotland under under the duke of Lauderdale, humbly offered to your majesty's consideration, in obedience to your royal commands. This paper exposed the ravages of the Highland host, the hardships of incapacitating persons for public trust, of which several instances were given; the injustice of illegal imprisonments, the cruelty used to prisoners, the hardships many endured by unreasonable and arbitrary fines, and by placing garrisons in gentlemens houses, &c. The curious reader may peruse the paper at large in Mr Wodrow, p. 102, &c. who justly observes, that it certainly contained a material vindication of the people at Bothwell, who appeared in defence of religion and liberty; and adds, that, had the noblemen and gentlemen, who drew up this paper, laid many things contained in it at the door of the prelates, as well as that of Lauderdale, the representation had been more full and just. But Sharp, the primum mobile, was gone; and so the duke was charged with all. Now it was the publishing and dispersing of this paper that occasioned the letter to the council formerly mentioned. However, before the council's answer to the king's letter reached the court, his majesty allowed a conference in his own presence at Windsor-castle as to the matters of complaint. The debates lasted no less than eight hours, viz. from ten to one in the forenoon, and from four to nine in the evening on the 8th of July, There was to be another conference on the 13th, but duke Hamilton and the rest, seeing how things were like to go, desisted from making any farther attempt; for, on the 11th of July, the complainers found that now his majesty was resolved to stand by Lauderdale; and on the 13th the king sent three letters, one to the council, another to the lords of session, and a third to the lords of justiciary, approving of all their conduct; so that Lauderdale still stood his ground. Bishop Burnet says, 'The hearing came on as was proposed; and it was made out, beyond the possibility of an answer, that the giving commissions to an army to live on free quarters, in a quiet time, was against the whole constitution, as well as the express laws of the kingdom; and that it was never done but in an enemy's country, or to suppress a rebellion. They shewed, likewise how unjust and illegal all the other parts of his administration were. The earls of Essex and Hallifax told him that every thing was made out fully.' He farther says, that though kings naturally love to hear prerogative magnified, yet, on this occasion, the king had nothing to say in defence of the administration. But when May, the master of the privy-purse, asked him, in his familiar way, what he thought now of his Lauderdale? he answered, as May himself told the doctor, That they had objected many damned things that he had done against them; but there was nothing objected that was against his service. From the whole it appears that the king was inflexible. And, as this administration had the royal countenance and approbation, the reader will not be surprized at the continuance and increase of injustice and oppression.

CHAP. II.

Of the execution of Mr King, Mr Kid, and of the five that suffered at Magus muir; the circuit courts; the third indulgence, and other remarkable things to the end of the year.

MAny suffered unto death on account of Bothwel, Mr King and Mr Kid were the first who fell a sacrifice to the rage of the prosecutors, and were the only ministers who were apprehended on this occasion. When Mr King was taken is not certainly known; only it is remarkable, that, when a party of the English dragoons were on horseback at Glasgow, one of them called for some ale, and drank to the confusion of the covenants, &c. Then meeting one of his comrades at the Stable-green port, who asking him whether he was going? he answered, To carry King to hell. This was on the Lord's day. But the poor wretch had not rode far, till his carbine accidentally went off and killed him on the spot. The party carried Mr King to Edinburgh.

Mr Kid was among the prisoners taken at Bothwell, and was frequently examined by some of the counsellors, particularly as to the occasion and beginning of this rising, and the persons concerned in it; but they could find nothing more than has been related. And though he had been accused of being a popish priest, yet he gave abundant proof of his being a firm protestant, and a good man.

Both Mr King and Mr Kid were before the council on the 9th of July. When they were examined Mr King confessed that he was with those that rose at this time; that he remembered that Earlstoun younger was with them likewise, &c. but denies that he was with them when the king's forces were assaulted at Glasgow, or that he ever heard of a rising before it happened, or was ever upon any council with them. Mr Kid confessed that he had preached in the fields, but never where there were men in arms, except in two places. They signed their confessions, which were afterwards produced as evidence against them at their trial before the justiciary.

On the 12th of July the earl of Queensberry was admitted a counsellor, for his zeal in promoting his majesty's service, and suppressing the rebels. The same day, in a letter to Lauderdale, they proposed some difficulties relating to the proclamation of the 29th of June, which was a modest way of asking a repeal of it, for they did not relish any favours to be shewn. However, on the 14th, a letter came by express from his majesty, at the procurement of the duke of Monmouth, enlarging favours to ministers, which was so very disagreeable to the managers, that the archbishop of Glasgow was dispatched to court, where it is likely he fell in with the duke of York's party; for in a little time these favours were curtailed, and about the end of the year wholly taken away. The same day Mr Kid was examined before the council; and they imagining that he was not ingenuous in his answers, ordered him to be put to the torture. It seems he was more than once in the boots, and behaved with great meekness and patience.

On the 16th Mr King was examined before the justiciary; and when he signed his confession it was ordered to be inserted in the books of adjournal, to be produced as evidence against him. Mr Kid appeared next day, but refusing to sign his confession, the lords subscribed it, and ordered it to be registered, as in the case of Mr King.

On the 18th the council granted a petition to prosecute Alexander Hamilton of Kinkell, in order to his being forfeited; and being informed that John Cuningham of Bedlane, who had been forfeited on account of Pentland, had been at Bothwell, ordered him and his sureties to be summoned before them. Mr Hamilton of Kinkell underwent a series of troubles ever since the restoration; for he had sheltered the ejected ministers, and encouraged them to preach in his house, without hindering any that had a mind to come and hear them. This exposed him to the indignation of the primate, who ordered him to be summoned from the pulpit, in order to excommunication. The people of St Andrews being so disgusted that a person of Kinkell's piety and character should be thus served, generally went out of the church. The bishop, seeing his excommunication would be treated with contempt, got him intercommuned, which obliged him to quit his house, and undergo many hardships. Soon after that a garrison was sent to his house, by whom his lady (who was then near her time) and family were turned out of doors. The garrison continued in the house several weeks, destroyed most of the furniture, and consumed the provisions. After Bothwel he was taken, bound with cords, and carried to Edinburgh, where he remained prisoner about eight months. Though he escaped forfeiture, yet his estate was ruined. And it was after a kind of banishment for several years, that, in 1687, he returned to his own house at Kinkell; but upon setting up a meeting-house, he was brought under new troubles; for, at the instigation of the primate, Ross, he and Mr Orrock the preacher were, by a party of soldiers, carried prisoners to Edinburgh, but in a little time they were set at liberty.

It was about this time that the king and council made over the moveables of those who had been at Bothwell to whom they thought proper, which occasioned great oppression; for the donators, as they were called, who had this gift made to them, in a manner plundered all they suspected; ſuſpected, ſo that few pariſhes in the weſt and ſouth eſcaped this heavy oppreſſion.

On the 19th the council wrote to Lauderdale acquainting him that they had called the preachers, who were priſoners in Edinburgh, (my author thinks theſe were the field preachers, the others being releaſed the 4th) and offered them a bond, which two of them ſubſcribed, and the reſt refuſed, and that they had ſent for the priſoners in the Baſs in order to make the ſame offer to them. Accordingly, Mr Patrick Anderſon, Mr James Fraſer of Brae, Mr Thomas Hog, Mr John MacGilligen, Mr John MacAulay, Mr Robert Roſs, Mr John Law, and Mr William Bell, were brought from the Baſs to the tolbooth of Edinburgh, where ſome other miniſters were confined, particularly Mr Robert Fleming miniſter at Cambuſlang afterwards of the Scots congregation at Roterdam. Though they were willing to find bail fot their appearance when called, yet, becauſe they refuſed to oblige themſelves to live peaceably, and not to riſe in arms againſt the king, or any authoriſed by him, they were remanded to priſon. This was contrary to the king's letter, which allowed them, either to oblige themſelves as above, or find bail; but the managers inſiſted on the firſt. Mr William Kyle and Mr Francis Irvine, who ſigned the obligation, were ſet at liberty. However, after ſome time, the reſt of the miniſters were releaſed upon bond to appear when called.

On the 22d Robert Hamilton of Airdrie, his ſervant, and about 15 other priſoners, were ſet at liberty upon obliging themſelves to live peaceably, &c. The ſame day the council had permiſſion to releaſe lord Cardroſs upon paying his fine. Mr King and Mr Kid received their indictment at this time; and, on the 24th, they petitioned the council that they might be allowed advocates to plead for them, ſince they were ſo ſoon to be tried for their life; accordingly Mr David Thoirs and Mr William Monnipenny were allowed them.

This day Mr Veitch, inſtead of having ſentence of death paſſed upon him, was, in conſequence of a letter from his majeſty, ordered to be ſet at liberty, and to retire to England. The reaſon of this ſudden turn was, that Mr Veitch, finding that ſentence of death was to be pronounced againſt him, prevailed with his friend Mr G. Elliot, afterwards one of the lords of ſeſſion, to ride poſt to London. Mr Elliot, not having acceſs to Lauderdale, applied to the earl of Shaftſbury and others of his party, by whom he was adviſed to print Mr Veitch's caſe, ſignifying his being apprehended in England, after near 13 years reſidence in that country, and ſent to Scotland to be judged for alledged crimes, and to give a copy of the caſe to each of the members of parliament. This was done. Then the king was applied to, and in a manner threatened with a parliamentary enquiry into this conduct to an Engliſh ſubject. Whereupon the king wrote the letter juſt now hinted; and it came within an hour before the ſentence of death was to have been paſſed. The ſame day about 20 more priſoners for conventicles were ſet at liberty.

Theſe favours were granted to put ſome ſtop to the clamours made againſt Lauderdale's adminiſtration; and it is not improbable, had not the duke of York come down, that there had been more of this kind ſhewn; however, they were ſo far from being agreeable to the managers at Edinburgh, that, on the 25th of July, the earl of Linlithgow and Claverhouſe had the council's permiſſion to repair to London. They were in a few days followed by the chancellor, and great changes were about this time talked of.

Mean while the trial of Mr King and Mr Kid came on, and they appeared before the juſticiary on the 18th. Their advocates gave in a petition in their favour, praying that the lords would allow them an exculpation, or liberty to vindicate themſelves from the charge of high-treaſon given in againſt them. In order to this the petition bears, that Mr King's being with the rebels did not proceed from any rebellious principles, but, being taken by Claverhouſe, he was releaſed by the rebels, and not ſuffered to go from them; ſo that, in fact, he was always in the quality of a priſoner; that, during the time he was with them, he not only refuſed to preach, but made it his buſineſs to perſuade them to return to their former loyalty, and actually perſuaded ſeveral to deſert them; and that he only carried a ſword the better to diſguiſe himſelf from being taken for a preacher, but never made uſe of it. And as to Mr Kid, that he retired from them as ſoon as he could, and abſolutely refuſed to return, and invited ſuch of them as came in his way to lay down their arms, and throw themſelves on the king's mercy. And that it was at the deſire of ſome of the moſt peaceable, that, in the ſimplicity of his heart, he went to Hamilton to perſuade them to obedience; ſo that, when Robert Hamilton, and ſome of the ringleaders, became enraged at his advice, as he was going home he was purſued by a party of rebels, who threatened to kill him if he did not return; and, when taken, he got quarters and aſſurance of his life from the lord-general, &c. And as for being preſent at field-conventicles, it was pleaded, that, if the petitioners freed themſelves from the rebellion, they were ſecured from this by his majeſty's late proclamation; and they offered to prove all the premiſes by unexceptionable witneſſes. But no exculpation was allowed them; for, when their indictment was read, the advocate produced their confeſſions before the council as proofs againſt them; and accordingly they were brought in guilty, and condemned to be hanged at the market-croſs of Edinburgh on Thurſday the 14th of Auguſt, and their heads and right arms to be cut off, and diſpoſed of at the council's pleaſure. The reader is to judge how far it was equitable to refuſe them acceſs to vindicate themſelves as far as they were able. Intereſt was made for a remiſſion, but to no purpoſe.

On the 31ſt of July, John Balmerino, Andrew Sandgraſs, and about 20 others, were ſet at liberty, on ſigning a bond to live peaceably, and not to riſe in arms againſt the king, or any commiſſioned by him. The ſame day lord Cardroſs was ordered by the council to be releaſed, upon paying the ſums in which he was fined. Accordingly his lordſhip gave bond, and got out of priſon; but, being outlawed for not paying his fine, his ſimple and liferent eſcheat was fallen into the king's hands. We ſhall hear more of him next year.

Mean while the king ſignified, in a letter to the council, his deteſtation of the murder of the late archbiſhop of St Andrews, and commanded them to proſecute nine of thoſe who were concerned in the late rebellion, with this additional conſideration of having owned theſe murderers who were excepted from any indemnity; and that, if thoſe were convicted, they ſhould be hanged in chains in the place where the murder was committed.

Accordingly a committee was appointed, who, on the 6th of Auguſt, reported that they had ordered nine to be proſecuted as directed, had examined the priſoners in the Gray-friars church yard, and took particular notice of thoſe who refuſed to call the late riſing in arms rebellion, or killing the archbiſhop murder, and thoſe that refuſed the bond not to riſe in arms hereafter, and had made up a liſt of 30 perſons. They likewiſe gave it as their opinion, that, as there were other priſoners in the tolbooth of Edinburgh and Canongate of the ſame guilt and perſuaſion, the king's advocate or depute ſhould be appointed to examine them, and proſecute nine of the moſt guilty; and that a ſecret committee, conſiſting of three or four at moſt, ſhould be ordered to give in liſts of ſuch heritors, ringleaders, and preachers, as were not yet taken, to general Dalziel, with warrants to ſecure their perſons till they be brought to juſtice. They likewiſe moved, that the priſoners for conventicles be ſet at liberty, and that William Page, who had been fined in 1000l. and Robert Blair in 2000 merks, be remitted to the treaſury for a modification. All which the council approved of, and appointed the earl of Moray, the biſhop of Edinburgh, lord Collingtoun, Mr Maitland, and general Dalziel, or any three of them, to be a committee for the ſaid purpoſes.

On the 8th of Auguſt a conſiderable number of miniſters met at Edinburgh, and agreed, '1. That all miniſters ſhould, in the firſt place, viſit their own congregations where they were formerly ſettled, and try what acceſs they can have to preach the goſpel to them. 2. That they aſſociate themſelves into meetings, as their numbers in particular bounds, and their circumſtances will beſt allow, bow, and take care to provide preaching to the people in the bounds of their respective meetings who are desirous of it. 3. That every minister shall be a member of the meeting within whose bounds he resides. 4. That indulged ministers, not indulged to the congregations they were in when laid aside, if their people of whom they formerly had the charge, call them, return to them, and quit the places they are at present in. 5. That all who are licensed to preach be particularly taken, obliged into subjection unto the meeting which licensed them, and to subject themselves to their direction.'

Though Mr Woodrow says, that the ministers of this meeting had the principles of presbyterian government at heart, together with the preservation of the church from any hazard from persons who should afterwards be licensed and ordained, and that, had they not been stopt by the new turn of affairs at court, the last indulgence would have been so managed as to have cured the divisions and been of great service both to church and state, yet I find the Revd. Mr MacWard, Mr Brown &c. were of a contrary opinion; for as they esteemed the indulgence first and last to be the product of the supremacy, and inconsistent with presbyterian principles, so they could not call this a presbyterian meeting, because, instead of testifying against the indulgence, they plainly approved of it, and virtually abandoned that testimony which many sealed with their blood. But these things I must leave with the reader.

On the 13th, at a large meeting of the council, the king's indemnity was ordered to be published, by the magistrates of Edinburgh, with great solemnity and all demonstrations of joy. At the same time a committee was appointed to consider what was farther to be done with the murderers of the archbishop, the case of the prisoners, and the state of the Highlands. This committee proposed the holding of circuit-courts, the better to prosecute those concerned at Bothwell, and the murderers of the primate, and moved that James Hamilton an apprentice prisoner in the Gray-friars church-yard, be set at liberty. Accordingly,

On the 14th, the proclamation for holding circuit-courts in October next was published, signifying, among other things, that they who did not lay hold on the indemnity, and all who were concerned in Pentland and at Bothwell, and the murderers of the archbishop, and all who supplied or corresponded with them, were to be prosecuted with rigour before them. By this proclamation the clerks of the justice court were enjoined to have in readiness a porteous roll, or a list of the names and designations of the said rebels, and of those who should be informed against, upon oath, to have been in the rebellion, or to have harboured the rebels, or the murderers of the late archbishop of St. Andrews, and of those who had been at field conventicles since the proclamation of the 9th of June last; summonses were likeways ordered to be given in time to those who were to appear. In this proclamation for circuits, they who killed the archbishop were particularly described. All heritors and landlords, where any of the rebels lived, were commanded to apprehend and present them to the circuit, and, in case they fled, to remove their wives children and servants from off their grounds (so that the innocent were to be punished with the guilty,) by this proclamation a reward of 10,000 merks was offered to those who should bring in any of the murderers of the primate dead or alive; nay, the persons whom his majesty had cut off from his indemnity were to be pardoned, and have the reward besides, if they should apprehend John John Balfour of Kinloch, and David Hackstoun of Rathillet, dead or alive; and, to put the greater honour on these courts, all dukes, marquises, archbishops, earls, lords spiritual and temporal, were ordered to attend. I shall only observe, that these courts were established through all the principal parts of the country, where it could be imagined any of those people were supposed to be found.

The act of indemnity, above mentioned, was published the same day with all the outward signs of rejoicing. A scaffold was erected at the cross, and the magistrates, in their formalities, were witnesses to the proclamation. But, considering the many exceptions, it yielded very little joy to the people concerned in the rising; for, at one stroke, ministers and heritors who were concerned in the rebellion, or contributed to it, were cut off together, with those that did not come to assist the king's host. Nay, few could comply with the conditions of this famous act of grace; for they were to engage never to bear arms against the king or his authority, nor to be at any field conventicles. They had no notion of passive obedience and non-resistance, though, at the same time, none shewed greater loyalty than they. But what could they do, when their liberties and lives, and, which was dearer to them than all, their religion, were in the most cruel and barbarous manner invaded? It was likewise in vain to think that these brave confessors would bind up themselves from hearing the gospel in the open fields. However, this indemnity pardoned all authors of infamous libels or pasquils, all who had misrepresented any of the king's judicatories and servants. This plainly points at duke Hamilton, &c. So that matters were come to a fine pass, when some of the chief of the nobility were ranked among those whom they reputed rebels and traitors. In short, this was like king Charles's acts of grace, good for nothing. However, the publication of it was attended with ringing of bells in the forenoon, and in the afternoon Mr John King and Mr John Kid were hanged, and their heads cut off upon another scaffold. One would be tempted to think the managers pitched on that day to be a day of rejoicing for a mock indemnity, when those two faithful ministers of Christ were put to death. However, though they were cut off from having a share in this indemnity, yet they died in peace, and with a joy which none of their persecutors could intermeddle with. Their last speeches are in Naphtali, in which they bore a faithful and honourable testimony against popery, prelacy, erastianism, and for the covenanted work of reformation.

Mr Kid, when speaking of the rising at Bothwell, says, 'For personal presence with that party whom they called rebels, for my part I never judged them or called them such. I acknowlege there was a great many there who came in the simplicity of their hearts.——I am as sure, on the other hand, there was a great party there, that had nothing before them but repairing of the Lord's fallen down work, and restoring of the breach which is wide as the sea.—But for rebellion against his majesty's person or lawful authority, the Lord knows my soul abhorreth it, name and thing. Loyal I have been and will every Christian be so; and I was ever of this judgment, to give to 'Cesar the things that are Cesar's, and to God the things that are God's.' After this he declared his abhorrence of popery with which he had been falsly accused, and concluded his testimony with these words, 'As I have lived in the faith of this, that the three kingdoms are married lands; so I die in the faith of it, that there will be a resurrection of his name, word, cause, covenants, and all of his interests therein; though I dare not determine the time when, or the manner, how; but leave all these things to the infinitely wise God, who hath done, and will do all things well. O that he would return to this land again, repair our breaches, take away our backslidings, and appear for his work!——Come Lord Jesus, come quickly! himself hasten it in his own time and way! 'The Lord is my light and my life, my joy, my song, and my salvation.' The God of his chosen be my mercy this day, and the enriching comforts of the Holy Ghost keep me up, and carry me fair through, to the glory of his grace, to the edification of his people, and my own eternal advantage. Amen.

Mr King's testimony was much to the same purpose with that of his fellow martyr. Among other things he spoke to the commendation of the cross of Christ, and concluded in this moving and affecting manner, 'Now I bid farewel to all my friends and dear relations; farewel my poor wife and child, whom I leave on the good hand of him who is better than seven husbands, and will be a father to the fatherless. Farewel all creature-comforts, and welcome everlasting life, everlasting glory, everlasting love, and everlasting praise. 'Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me.'

Thus these two went to their master's joy, and left their persecutors to conclude the day, with their bonefires, on account account of the notable indemnity published in the forenoon. Their heads and right hands were cut off and placed beside that of Mr Guthrie on the Nether-bow port.

On this dismal day the council wrote to Lauderdale, desiring that a frigate might be sent down in order to transport the prisoners in the Gray friars church yard. They likeways ordered the ministers, who were prisoners in Edinburgh, (those. viz. that refused their bond) to be released on finding sufficient bail to appear when called, under the penalty of 10,000 merks each.

Next day, the 15th of August, the king wrote to the council, and ordered the following persons to be criminally prosecuted. The reason was, that upon examination of some of the prisoners, several did not own the rising of Bothwell to be rebellion, nor the killing of the primate to be murder. And we shall afterwards find that several were executed on this very same account, when nothing else could be laid to their charge. The persons who had been called and examined, were James Lilebura in Kinross, refused the bond, N M; David Hardie in Leslie refused the bond, N R, N M; Robert Bogie in Newbigging, N R, N M; John Richardson in Stenhouse refused the bond, N R; Robert MacGill weaver in Gallowshiels, N M; David Somervell in East-Calder refused the bond, N R, N M; Alexander Steven in Bothwell parish, N R N M; Thomas Williamson in Overcranstoun, N R, N M; John Scott in Ettrick, N R, N. M; William Cameron in Dalmellingtown, N R, N M; Robert Miller in Waterford, N R, N M; James Wood in Newmills, N R, N M; John Govan in Kirkliston, N R, N, M; Thomas Pringle in Stow parish, N R, N, M; Andrew Sword in the parish of Borg in the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, N R, N, M; James Gray in West-Calder, N R, N M; John Thomson in Shots, N M; John Waddel in ditto, N, M; Patrick Keir in the parish of Kincardin, N R, N, M; Thomas Brown in Edinburgh, N R, N M; William Anderson in Livingstone parish, NR, N M.

N. B. The names marked N R are those who would not acknowlege the rising to be rebellion, and those marked N M who would not own the primate's death to be murder.

About this time 15 of the prisoners in the Gray-friars church yard, whom they looked upon as the ringleaders, were brought to the tolbooth of Edinburgh in order to be tried for their life. Mr Edward Jamison was sent to them from the meeting of ministers formerly mentioned, though Mr Wodrow says he found no evidence that he was sent by them. yet he owns he went and reasoned with them at a considerable length, in order to persuade them to subscribe the bond. He urged the lawfulness of this expedient to save their lives, and endeavoured to make them sensible that their refusal would be a reflexion on religion, and the cause they appeared for, and throwing away their lives, for which their friends would not be able to vindicate them. He prevailed with 13 of them; who were set at liberty. But this compliance lay heavy on several of them. Most of the prisoners in the church-yard by the solicitation of their friends, and the advices of some ministers, particularly as is said, of Mr Hugh Kennedy, Mr William Creighton, Mr Edward Jamison, and Mr George Johnston, signed the bond, while others refused to accept deliverance upon such terms as were inconsistent with their principles. The Rev. Mr John Blackadder, being at this time in Edinburgh, was very serviceable to these prisoners, and in a particular manner dissuaded them from complying with the bond. What came of those who refused this compliance we shall hear in its proper place; only, several who did comply shared the same fate with those who did not.

On the 26th of August, William Richardson in Stenhouse, Thomas Brown shoemaker in Edinburgh, John and Alexander Balfours in Gilstoun, Thomas Williamson in Over Waristoun, Robert MacGill in Gallashiels, Rob. Miller in Waterford, James Paton in Inverkeithing, and Andrew Thompson in Sanchy, were indicted for treason in joining with those at Bothwell: but it was the month of November before any of them were brought to trial, mean while several were appointed to plead for them. The same day Mr Andrew Donaldson, Mr—Erskine, and John Henderson in Cliesh, who had been confined for conventicles, and had been forgot when others obtained their liberty, were released.

On the 19th of September the council wrote to Lauderdale for liberty to the justices to offer the bond, which was granted. At the same time new powers were given to the army to seize the murderers of the archbishop, to apprehend any ministers or heritors guilty of the late rebellion, or others of the rebels who had not signed the bond, or any who harboured them, and secure them in prison, with power likeways to dissipate field-conventicles, and apprehend the preachers and others present at them, and indemnified the soldiers of all slaughter and murder on in case of resistance. They likeways ordered the rents, money and moveables belonging to the murderers of the primate, and the heritors engaged in the rebellion, to be sequestrated; and enjoined the advocate to prosecute Mr George Johnstoun, or any other ministers who have been guilty of field-conventicles since the 29th of June last, with power to major Robert Johnstoun to search for any suspected conventicles in or about Edinburgh, &c.

On the same 19th of September they agreed on the following licence to be given to those ministers who had liberty to preach; 'The lord's of his majesty's privy-council, having considered the petition of—, representing that they have chosen—to preach and administrate the sacraments in the parish of—conform to his majesty's proclamation June 29th, and his letter July 14th, and therefore desiring that caution may be received for the said—conform to the said proclamation. The lords grant the supplicants desire, who have accordingly found sufficient caution acted in the books of privy council for the said—that he shall live peaceably, and in order thereto, that the said—shall appear before the council, when the said cautioners shall be called to produce him, under the penalty of six thousand merks in case of failie.

The following bond was likewise to be given for the said minister: 'Be it kend to all men by these presents, me——for as much as, upon a humble supplication, given in to his majesty's privy council, they have ordained caution to be received for———who is allowed to preach and administrate sacraments in the parish of ——, therefore I bind and oblige myself, my heirs and successors, that the said —— shall live peaceably; and in order thereunto, that I the said —— oblige myself and foresaids to present him before his majesty's privy council when I am called so to do; and in case of my failie in not presenting him, I shall be be liable in the payment of the sum of six thousand merks Scots money. Consenting, &c.' in common form.

It was on account of these bonds that some have called this the banded indulgence. At a meeting of ministers, about the end of this month, the most part judged it lawful at this time to comply; but I find them condemned by others, who thought that, by coming under these bonds, they condemned themselves as guilty of former unpeaceableness, and engaged in a sinful peace with the enemies of God, and became bound and fettered, by these bonds, from bearing a testimony against the defections of the times, and the encroachments made both upon civil and sacred liberty *. But these things I must leave with the

* Some time after this a pamphlet was published, intitled, The Banders disbanded; in which the author, said to be Mr MacWard, endeavours to prove, that it was sinful, scandalous, and inconvenient to comply with these bonds. It will not therefore be improper to give the reader a short view of some part of his reasoning on this subject. Having accordingly laid down sundry positions concerning the reformed government of the Church of Scotland, and shewn the many engagements that lay upon the nation by the covenants, to maintain and defend the same, together with the manifold encroachments and invasions made by the civil magistrate upon the royal prerogatives of Christ, the intrinsic privileges of his church, and the just freedom of his ambassadors, by introducing prelacy, and persecuting non-conformists, &c. and taken notice of the faithful wrestlings and contendings of our worthy predecessors in defence of their sacred liberties, from thence he infers, that the very name and notion of any bond and engagement, required by the then rulers as a condition of admitting ministers to the exercise of their ministry, was odious and detestable at the first view, especially to engage in such a bond as then required, and most of all that a body of ministers should vote this to be lawful and warrantable. And,

1. He produces several arguments to prove the sinfulness of giving such bonds, because the cautioner, or surety, by this bond, obliges himself to perform an impossibility; for however he might engage for himself, yet he could not engage for another, whom he could neither constrain by force, nor command by authority. He further shews, that the reader. We ſhall find that this third indulgence was but of ſhort continuance.

On the 20th of September another proclamation was iſſued againſt the murderers of the archbiſhop, with their names inſerted, viz. John Balfour of Kinloch, David Hackſtoun of Rathillet, George Balfour in Gilſtoun, James Ruſſil in Kettle, Robert Dingwal a tenant's ſon in Cadam, Andrew Guillan weaver in Balmerinoch, Alexander and Andrew Henderſons ſons to John Henderſon in Kilbrachmont, and George Fleming ſon to George Fleming in Ballouthy. Such miniſters and heritors who were in what they called the late rebellion, and ſay that had harboured any of the murderers, or rebels, were put into the proclamation; at the end of which all magiſtrates of royal burghs were ordered to take the declaration by next Michaelmas.

The ſame day Mr William Erſkine, who had been priſoner in Stirling above three years, was ordered to be let at liberty. And though Mr James Rymer, late profeſſor of philoſophy at St Andrews, was found innocent of harbouring any of the murderers of the primate, yet he was ordered to give another bond, under the penalty of 10,000 merks, to appear before the juſticiary when called.

According to the order of time we are now come to ſpeak of the circuit courts, which were appointed to ſit down on the firſt of October, &c. A diſtinct account of their proceedings is not to be expected, as their records, if they kept any, are not to be found. According to the proclamation, the clerks, or their deputes, before the meeting of circuits, went through every pariſh in the preciſt of the court, and took up information as directed; and not only the ſheriffs and juſtices of the peace, but alſo the curates, exerted themſelves to the utmoſt to get informations.

From theſe informations the porteous-rolls were framed. Theſe rolls were filled up with all ſorts of perſons who had any ſubſtance, whether they had been at Bothwell or not. The moſt innocent were informed againſt by any envious neighbour, or baſe prodigal, and, when once in thoſe rolls, the greedy donators obliged them to compound for their moveables, or ſeized them, even before any indictment or ſentence. Many were the oppreſſions and hardſhips which numbers endured upon this ſcore.

When the lords of the circuit ſat down in the places aſſigned them, great numbers were before them, eſpecially at Glaſgow, Ayr and Dumfries. They who appeared, and confeſſed they had been at Bothwell, if they were not heritors, had the bond offered them. They who appeared, and deſired their indictment, were impriſoned till they found bail to appear at Edinburgh, and anſwer to the things that ſhould be laid to their charge; but all who did not appear were declared fugitives, and denounced rebels. The abſent heritors (for very few of them appeared) were denounced, and not a few ſoon after were forfeited. Noblemen, gentlemen, ſoldiers, and others, who were moſt active in the arbitrary meaſures of this period, obtained gifts of their eſtates, and ſeveral kept poſſeſſion of them till the happy revolution; and they who had no heritage had their houſes and goods ſpoiled by the ſoldiers. Theſe were the happy effects of theſe itinerary courts! We ſhall hear more of them in the following years.

On the 16th of October, the council, being informed that the duke of York was coming to Scotland, wrote to the abſent members to repair with all ſpeed to Edinburgh, ſince they intended to meet his royal highneſs on the borders. All noblemen and gentlemen in the neighbourhood were ordered to attend them on this occaſion; and Mr Maitland of Dudhop was ſent to wait on the duke in England.

About the end of Auguſt laſt, the king being at Windſor was ſeized with three violent fits of an intermitting fever. The fits were ſo long and ſevere that the phyſicians apprehended he was in danger. The earl of Eſſex and lord Halifax, two of the four counſellors who then managed the king's affairs, fearing, if the king died, to fall into the hands of the duke of Monmouth and the earl of Shaftſbury, adviſed the king to ſend for the duke of York, which was done with all ſecrecy and ſpeed; for the duke arrived at Windſor on the ſecond of September. But the king, being then out of danger pretended a ſurpriſe at his arrival: and, when he was recovered, it was moved that the duke ſhould return beyond ſea. This was contrary to the inclinations of his highneſs; but, finding his brother poſitive, he moved that the duke of Monmouth might be put out of all command, and ſent abroad. This was complied with. Both dukes went beyond ſea. But, ſays biſhop Burnet, lord Tweeddale, being then at London, moved the lord Peterborough, that it would be more honourable, and more for the duke's intereſt, inſtead of living beyond ſea, to go and live in Scotland; his motive was, that, ſince the duke of Monmouth had loſt all credit with the king, duke Lauderdale would again be continued in his poſts, and act over his former extravagancies; he judged, that, upon the duke of York's being in Scotland, Lauderdale would be chequed. Peterborough went immediately to the king, who approved of it. So notice was given to the duke, and he was appointed to meet the king at New-market. The duke met the king accordingly; upon which Shaftſbury was ſoon turned out, and lord Roberts, then made earl of Radnor, became preſident of the council. There were ſeveral other alterations; and the king became entirely under the management of his brother. Beſides all this, his highneſs, perceiving a ſtorm gathering againſt him in England, was willing to retire till that was a little abated. However, the reader may ſee that the miniſtry in Scotland had early notice of theſe proceedings; for the council had a letter from the king on the 18th of September, ſignifying that he had recalled the commiſſion of the duke of Buccleugh and Monmouth from being general; and on the 16th of October they began to prepare for the reception of his royal highneſs, whoſe preſence very much ſtrengthened the violent party in the council, and promoted the ſevere meaſures of the prelates againſt the preſbyterians, who could expect no favour from popery and papiſts.

By a letter from the king, dated November 1ſt, general Dalziel received an unlimited commiſſion, except in emergencies of ſtate, when the council were allowed to give directions; and the officers and ſoldiers had orders to ſearch for and apprehend thoſe who were declared fugitives and rebels by the juſticiary.

When the managers found that what would ariſe, from the eſtates of thoſe who had been perſonally concerned in the riſing, would not anſwer their expectation, a more general oppreſſion was reſolved upon. Accordingly, on the ſixth of November, a committee was appointed to meet with the lords of juſticiary to conſider what was to be done with thoſe who did not attend the king's hoſt. Accordingly, on the 8th, they gave it as their opinion that that they ſhould be fined, the moſt guilty not above two years valued rent, and the leaſt in the fourth part of their rent, and be obliged to take the oath of allegiance and the declaration; that whoever engages in this bond, thereby acknowleges the civil magiſtrate to be the fountain of all eccleſiaſtical authority, without any regard either to the rights of the people, or the juſt authority of the church-judicatories. He likewiſe obſerves, that this bond may be interpreted contrary to former lawful bonds and covenants, and ſo cannot be entered into without ſin. Beſides, he that engages in this bond, binding himſelf to pay 6000 merks in caſe he fail, or do not preſent the miniſter to the council when called, to be active in perſecuting and puniſhing himſelf for that which is not his own fault. From theſe, and ſeveral other conſiderations, he infers, that theſe bonds could not be entered into without ſin. But,

2. This author aſſerts it to be ſcandalous to enter into theſe engagements, becauſe the bond preſuppoſes the faithful miniſters of the goſpel to have formerly been of a turbulent and rebellious diſpoſition, and therefore were not now to be truſted, but others were to be taken engaged as ſureties for their peaceable carriage and behaviour; and therefore, as this has a natural tendency to put a diſgrace upon miniſters, ſo alſo to bring their miniſtry into contempt: for what reſpect can any have for the miniſtry of thoſe who are looked upon as ſo infamous as not fit to be truſted? The author, after inſiſting on ſeveral other arguments ſhewing the ſcandalouſneſs of theſe bonds, proceeds, declaration; but, if they refused this last, to be fined in the highest degree. This was approved of, first by the council, and afterwards by the king; and measures were taken for getting lists of all those gentlemen they intended to prosecute on this point.

3. To ſhew the manifold inconveniencies of coming under the obligation of them. By this, he ſays, the miniſter is brought into a great ſnare, either to conceal ſome parts of the whole council of God, or, by preaching up his preſbyterial principles, to expoſe himſelf either to loſe his liberty, or be otherways puniſhed. By this the ſurety is obliged either to perſecute the miniſter, if he ſhould, in his apprehenſion, ſpeak any thing that ought not to be ſpoken, by preſenting him to the council, or be obliged to pay the penalty, if able, and, if not to ſuffer other hardſhips. By this alſo, not only the ſurety himſelf, but his heirs and ſucceſſors are involved with him; from theſe, and many other topics, this author infers the inconveniency of theſe bonds. How far his arguments are concluſive muſt be left with the reader, who will ſtill be a better judge in this particular if he carefully examine the pamphlet itſelf.

The same day the council ordered about 30 of the prisoners in the tolbooth of Edinburgh, who had refused the bond, to be prosecuted before the criminal court. Accordingly, on the 10th, James Finlay, Thomas Brown, J. Wood in Newmills, Andrew Sword weaver in the new artry of Kircudbright, John Waddel in New-Monkland, J. Clyde in Kilbryde, with several others, were before the justiciary. In their indictment they were charged with entering into a deep combination to overturn the fundamental laws both of church and state, proposing that they would have a parliament of their own framing without either bishops or noblemen, (all this was false) with burning his majesty's laws at Rutherglen; declaring his majesty an usurper, (false) and that he had robbed Jesus Christ of his crown, because he would not acknowledge them and their ministers to be Christ's infallible vicegerents, and to be superior to him in his own kingdom, (false and slanderous: no such thing ever entered their thoughts) that, when they engaged his majesty's forces, they gave for their word, no quarter; and that they refused it to all universally who fought for his majesty; (false) that they joined with the murderers of the archbishop, as their emissaries, (still false) and assembled an army of 10 or 12,000 men; (they never were half the number) that at Glasgow they robbed and spoiled the king's subjects, opened the prison doors, and threw out of the graves the dead bodies of such children as belonged to the orthodox clergy (false). In short, their indictment was stuffed with falsehoods, and embellished with lies. The truth is, the prisoners favoured the rising at Bothwell, though only some of them were personally there, and one without arms too. However, it was thought necessary to aggravate their rising to the utmost. My author justly observes, that, as the public papers of this period were generally so full of lies and slanders, it was no wonder though the English historians were led into mistakes when treating on the affairs of Scotland, especially considering the many lying pamphlets that were published by the Jacobites after the revolution.

The same day John Brown of Drumfarhan, James Clow in Ballock, and John Stevenson in Waterside, and eight others, were indicted for harbouring the murderers of the archbishop; but it seems the process was dropt; whereas five of the prisoners that had been indicted for the affair at Bothwell, viz. Thomas Brown, John Waddel, Andrew Sword, James Wood and John Clyde, were marked out for ruin; and, upon confessing their being at Bothwell, and refusing the bond, were condemned to be executed at Magus muir on the 18th instant, and to be hanged in chains, as if they had been the persons that killed the primate, though they were no ways accessory to it. However, it seems, that, for some reasons, their execution was put off to the 25th. And though the jury brought in James Wood as being taken at Bothwell without arms, yet the judges made no difference.

November the 13th the magistrates of Linlithgow, Inverkeithing and Kirkaldy had orders to suppress the meeting houses there; and a proclamation was published against conventicles, discharging all to preach, or hear sermons in any parish which had not given bond to the council, under severe penalties. And the same day, by another proclamation, the common people engaged in Bothwell were ordered, by the first of January next, to come and sign the bond, and satisfy the lords of justiciary why they had so long delayed it. There is no occasion for any remarks on these things.

On the 15th, 257 of the prisoners in the Gray friars church yard were put aboard a ship lying in the road of Leith, before any of their friends knew of it; and, tho' 30 were dangerously ill of a flux and other distempers, yet they were hurried away with the rest. They continued 12 days aboard before the ship sailed, and suffered inexpressible barbarity in the ship. They were so closely pinned up together, that they had scarce room to move. Their friends were neither permitted to see them, nor minister to their necessities. Some of them were forced to drink their own urine to quench their thirst; and some of the wicked sailors threw their excrements in their faces: and though a large collection, amounting, as was reported, to 14,000 merks, was made for them, yet little of it came to their hands; and indeed few of them lived long to want it, as we shall hear.

On the 24th his royal highness the duke of York was received into the town of Edinburgh with great solemnity, and was sumptuously entertained by the magistrates and the nobility. And thus the managers in Scotland caressed the great promoter and supporter of popery and tyranny, while many brave patriots in England were endeavouring his exclusion, as the only means to preserve the protestant religion and the liberties of the subject.

Next day the five prisoners above mentioned were executed at Magus muir; and nothing could be more proper, after the arrival and splendid reception of a popish prince, than to gratify him by cutting off some of the worst of heretics. The joint and separate testimonies of these sufferers are in Napthali, to which I refer the reader, who will there find the reason why they could not take the bond to save their lives, &c.

Thomas Brown was the first that was executed. He declared that he was never before in that country, and so was no ways accessory to the bishop's death; and added, 'As for my part in rising in arms, I intended no rebellion, but was then with that party in defence of the gospel, which I judged my duty,'—— after he had prayed, 'he blessed the Lord, that, if this day every hair of his head was a man, and every drop of his blood a life, he would cordially and heartily lay them down for Christ and his cause, for which he was now sentenced.'

Andrew Sword sung the 34th Psalm, and declared that he was never in that place before, and never saw a bishop, that he knew to be so. He blessed God for being kept from taking the engaging bond; and, having bid farewel to all created comforts, prayed before he died.

James Wood said the same as to the bishop's death, and was so far from repenting his being at Bothwell, or refusing the bond, that he gloried in it. When he was almost at the top of the ladder, he pulled up the napkin and said, 'Now I am going to lay down this life, and to step out of time into eternity; and if I had as many lives as there are hairs in mine head, and drops of blood in my body, I would willingly lay them down for Christ, and for you all that are here upon Christ's account. You may think that this is a frothy word, but it is the word of a dying man.' He then recommended Christ and his cause, in a moving way, to the spectators.

John Waddel declared his innocence as to the bishop's death, being never in that country before. He said that he refused to take the bond, because it was a denying of all appearances for Christ and his cause. He bore his testimony against popery, prelacy, malignancy, the indulgence first and last, and the abominable cess. Before he went to prayer, he said, 'Now, Sirs, I am not a whit discouraged to see my three brethren hanging before mine eyes, nor before all this multitude to pray.'

After John Clyde had gone to the ladder, he said, 'I think our being fetched here is like that which we have in scripture, about Herodias's suit to Herod anent John the Baptist's head, to gratify the unsatiableness of that lewd woman. Nothing would satisfy the lust of our persecutors but our blood, and in this manner and place, to gratify the bishop's friends.' He vindicated his joining those at Bothwell, and his refusing the bond, as the others had done before him. At the ladder foot he said to his brother, 'Weep not for me, brother, but weep for yourself and the poor land; and seek God, and make him sure to yourself, and he shall be better to you than ten brethren. Now farewel all friends and relations; farewel brother, sister and mother, and welcome Lord Jesus; into thy hands I commit my spirit.' And lifting his napkin from his face, he said, 'Dear friends, be not discouraged because of the cross, nor at this ye have seen this day; for I hope you have seen no discouragement in me, and you shall see no more.'

They were hung in chains according to the sentence, but now lie buried in a corn-field near Magus-muir, with a grave a grave ſtone upon them, which was ſet up in October 1728, with an inſcription, which the reader may ſee in the laſt edition of the Cloud of Witneſſes.

On the 27th the ſhip ſailed from the road of Leith with the poor priſoners, and met with ſeveral ſtorms in her paſſage. On the 10th they got to Orkney in a very tempeſtuous ſea. The priſoners, fearing what happened, deſired to be ſet aſhore, and ſent to what priſon the maſter pleaſed. But the captain, who was a papiſt, confined them under the hatches. About ten at night the ſhip was drove from her anchor upon a rock, and broke in the middle. The ſailors quickly got down the maſt, and, laying it between the broken ſhip and the rock, got aſhore; but ſuch was their barbarity, that no intreaties of the poor men could prevail with them to open the hatches, though, had that been done, moſt of them had been ſaved; whereas all of them were drowned in the hold, except only that an honeſt ſeaman, being ſtruck with horror at this cruelty, ventured his life to go aboard, and with an ax cutting through the deck of the veſſel, got 29 or 30 of them out alive; and ſo 200 were drowned, or rather murdered. After this piece of cruelty, ſays the author of the Memoirs, I think I need no apology for ſaying, that the reign of Dioclefian, or any of the moſt cruel perſecutors of God's church, could not match this; for theſe were men delivered, men to whom life was granted, according to the king's letter, dated 29th June, and the indemnity afterwards; and conſequently the perpetrators of this villainy ought to have been puniſhed by death, but no notice was taken of it: and if it be true, as was reported, that it was not poſſible that the ſhip in which theſe priſoners were to be ſent to America, could contain proviſions ſufficient for ſuch a number for ſo long a voyage, I leave the reader to make his own reflections.

Mean while a letter came down from the king, dated the 30th of November, ordering the duke of York to be admitted to act as a privy counſellor in Scotland without taking the oaths; to which our obſequious managers readily complied, his majeſty alledging that this was the privilege of the lawful ſons and brothers of the king.

About this time John Lord Bargany, nephew to the duke of Hamilton, being ſuſpected to favour thoſe concerned at Bothwell, was impriſoned in Blackneſs. Though he was examined by a committee, yet nothing was recorded; and, after all the attempts they made to faſten guilt upon him, they were forced to drop the affair.

On the 18th of December the council ordered Alex. and James Balfours, with James Neſs, to be farther examined concerning the primate's death, and Robert Garnock ſmith in Stirling to ly in priſon for farther examination. Some were releaſed, as John Henderſon, an old man, who had been impriſoned for harbouring his ſons after they had been at what they called the murder, Henry Schaw and Robert Blaw, George Fleming and —Sterk were continued in priſon on ſuſpicion of acceſſion to the death of Sharp.

CHAP. III.

Of the ſufferings of gentlemen for not attending the king's hoſt: the repeal of the third indulgence: the Queenſferry paper: the Sanquhar declaration, and other things to the ſkirmiſh at Airſmoſs.

THE affair of Bothwell was improved by the managers as a ſufficient handle for oppreſſing all ranks of people who could not in conſcience conform to prelacy; for not only the heritors and gentlemen who were ſuſpected to have countenanced the riſing, but thoſe who did not attend the king's hoſt, were rigorouſly proſecuted, together with ſeveral others, for nothing but their nonconformity. They who did not appear before the circuit courts were declared fugitives, and the donators were moſt ſevere upon the houſes and poſſeſſions of thoſe who were declared fugitives; and, in ſome places, the enemies of the preſbyterians diſcovered what ſpirit they were of, when they could act without controul. Thus, from the year 1680 to 1687, no family was permitted to live in the town of Dundee, but ſuch as conſtantly heard the epiſcopal miniſters. And this year Will. Mitchel, John Davidſon, John Sterrock, Eliz. White, and ſeveral more, were forced to leave the town on this very account. But I ſhall, as briefly as poſſible, relate the proceedings in the order of time.

Accordingly, on the ſixth of January, the council gave full power and commiſſion to the earl of Glencairn, lord Roſs, general Dalziel, or any fit perſon in the army, to diſcover the heritors who were at Bothwell, in the ſhires of Ayr, Lanerk, Renfrew and Dumbarton; and likewiſe to the earl of Queenſberry, Sir Robert Dalziel of Glena, Claverhouſe, or any two of them, and ſuch as they ſhould appoint, for the ſhires of Dumfries and Wigtoun, the ſtewartry of Kirkcudbright and Annandale. There were the like commiſſions given to others for other ſhires, and doubtleſs the commiſſioners acted their part.

On the 14th of January the council, in conſequence of a petition from John Lord Bargeny, ordered him to be brought from Blackneſs to the caſtle of Edinburgh whenever the advocate ſhould have his indictment ready. And,

On the 29th they impowered the earl of Monteith to diſſipate the conventicles in that ſhire, and apprehend and impriſon the preachers, in order to their being brought to trial.

On the 15th of February lord Cardroſs preſented a petition to the king, praying that his ſimple and literat eſcheat might be granted to the earl of Mar. With his petition he preſented a paper, intitled, A ſhort account of his ſufferings. The duke of Lauderdale had procured gift of this for his nephew Mr Maitland; and when his lordſhip's repreſentation had like to have ſome weight a copy of it was tranſmitted to the privy council, that they might interpoſe and prevent the king's granting his petition. Accordingly they wrote to his majeſty, and repreſented Cardroſs as diſaffected, &c. ſo that he obtained no redreſs, but continued under hardſhips till the revolution.

Mean while, on the 12th of February, the council granted liberty to ſuch as had a mind to uſe the Engliſh liturgy in their families, but very few were now tempted with this novelty, I ſhall only obſerve, that, while the council were paving the way for the introduction of the liturgy and ceremonies in Scotland, there was a brave ſet of patriots in England who began at this time to talk of reforming it there. And it is certain that the Scots epiſcopal clergy never received the ſervice book, till the intereſt of a popiſh Pretender came to be promoted in the reign of Queen Anne.

On the 15th of February, the duke of York took his leave of the council, and on the 17th ſet out for court, where he appeared on the 24th, and was received with great pomp and ſatisfaction by the king. The council at Edinburgh wrote up a letter full of the higheſt encomiums on his royal highneſs.

On the 18th many heritors were forfeited, moſtly in abſence, for their pretended acceſſion to the rebellion. The witneſſes brought againſt them were generally ſpies and ſoldiers. Mr Will. Ferguſon of Kaitloch, the lairds of Earlſtoun elder and younger, James Gordon younger of Craichlaw, Will. Gordon of Culvennan, Patr. Dunbar of Machrimoir, and —— MacGhie of Larg were all called, and the prepared witneſſes ſwearing to their being concerned in the rebellion, were forfeited. The reader is to obſerve, that the laird of Earlſtoun was killed when going to join the weſt country army. On this ſame day, Pat. MacDonald of Freugh was called, and two witneſſes ſwearing that they ſaw him among the rebels, was ſentenced to be executed when taken, and all his goods &c. to be confiſcated.

On the 23d a great number of gentlemen were brought before the juſticiary for abſence from the hoſt, and were fined, particularly James Young of Kirktoun in 1870 l. ——Pitlochie 700 l. Alexander Durham of Largo 1850 l. Dav. Balcanquel 500 l. Alexr. Nairn of Samford 294 l. Geo. Moncrief of Redie 300 l. James Weems in Glencorſtoun 175 l. Scots money, with many more. This was the practice of other meetings of the juſticiary, by whom not a few were fined in thouſands of pounds. We ſhall afterwards find that this affair of abſence from the hoſt was taken from the juſticiary, and put into the hands of the council.

On

On the 24th John Lord Bargeny was indicted for curſing ſome of the chief nobility, correſponding with Mr Weiſh and others of that party, maintaining the principles of Naphtali and Lex Rex, and declaring that it would never be well in Scotland till epiſcopacy was brought down, &c. and therefore ought to be puniſhed with forfeiture of life, &c. In March he was before the lords of juſticiary, who poſtponed the affair till the ſecond Monday of June, becauſe the advocate wanted ſome of his material witneſſes, notwithſtanding his pains to produce them, and the priſoner had neglected to give a copy of his letter of exculpation or defence.

The council, on the 6th of March, wrote to Alexander MacKenzie, ſheriff depute of the ſhire of Roſs, to uſe his utmoſt to ſuppreſs conventicles, and to apprehend Mr Denoon and Mr Hepburn, and diſſipate their meetings with all ſeverity.

On the 12th they wrote to the earl of Moray on the ſame ſubject and renewed their appointment of a committee for public affairs, for there had been none ſince laſt year; and accordingly they named Mr Alex. Burnet archbiſhop of St Andrews, who was tranſlated from Glaſgow after Sharp's death, the marquis of Athol, earl of Moray, biſhop of Edinburgh, lord Elphingſton, &c. or any three of them, to meet, as they ſhall ſee fit, and take the moſt effectual methods for ſuppreſſing field-conventicles and other diſorders, with all the powers the former committees had. The ſame day, being informed that theſe meetings abounded, eſpecially between the ſhires of Edinburgh, Berwick and Peebles, they ordered the general to have ſome of the guards ready to ſuppreſs them.

Some time in this month the council interpoſed in behalf of Will. Paterſon, who had the care of the priſoners whom he drowned at Orkney, for repairing the loſs he ſuſtained by his ſhipwreck. Thus a murderer was rewarded, while the innocent were perſecuted by death!

On the 8th of April they wrote to Lauderdale, and propoſed, that ſince the lords of juſticiary were ſo much engaged in proſecuting the heritors and miniſters who were in the rebellion, and the abſents from the king's hoſt, juſticiary commiſſions might be granted to ſeveral perſons for puniſhing thoſe who frequented field conventicles, &c. With the letter they ſent up articles for the general, by which they moved that the forces might attack the king's enemies, viz. 1. All who were forfeited by the parliament or criminal court. 2. All heritors and miniſters who had been in the rebellion. 3. Heritors who contributed to it. 4. All rebels who have not taken the bond. 5. All ſuch, who, though they have taken the bond, have been at field conventicles ſince the 27th of July laſt. 6. All thoſe who have done violence to the orthodox clergy. 7. Aſſaſſins, eſpecially the murderers of the biſhop, &c. All theſe propoſals were readily complied with at court, as we ſhall hear. The ſame day, James David, and Geo. Sinclairs and John Baptie in Pencaitland, were fined as guilty of field conventicles, becauſe they had heard ſermon in a private houſe where ſome ſtood without doors.

At the ſame time the Rev. Mr Gilbert Rule (after the revolution principal of the college of Edinburgh) being found guilty of keeping conventicles, and baptizing children without the pariſh of Preſtonhaugh, where he was indulged, and preaching in St Giles's church Edinburgh, and baptizing the two children of John Kennedy apothecary and James Livingſtone merchant; for theſe dreadful crimes the council deprived him of his majeſty's indulgence, and ſent him to the Baſs till the king's pleaſure ſhould be known. He had been regent in Glaſgow, and afterwards ſub-principal in the king's college at Aberdeen and before the reſtoration was miniſter at Alnwick in Northumberland; but, upon his being ejected by the Bartholomew act, he came down to Scotland, and now was impriſoned. John Kennedy was fined in 100 l. and James Livingſtone in 200 l. Scots.

On the 18th one Arthur Dongal, who had been at Bothwell, having been ſeized by the earl of Monteith with ſome papers about him, was ordered to be ſent to Edinburgh, as was one Rob. Short for ſome attempt on Mr Honeyman miniſter at Livingſtone.

On the 6th of May Mr James Ker, having preached at the houſe of Grange to about 500 hearers, while ſome were without doors, was ordered to oblige himſelf to keep no more conventicles under the penalty of 5000 merks.

The ſame day they wrote to the king, and moved that, for the ſecurity of the government, and conveniency of the forces, the manſion houſes, caſtles, and towers ſtanding on the forfeited eſtates, might be employed as he ſhould judge proper. The king thanked them for their care, and ordered them to give out commiſſions of juſticiary, and ſufficient warning to the owners of the houſes where the garriſons were to be placed. And now I am brought, in the order of time, to ſhew the riſe of new troubles, and of the increaſe of the perſecution; for on the third of June, Henry Hall of Haughead was ſeized. This gentleman, during the month of May and beginning of June, was much in company with Mr Cargill. They kept themſelves as private as they could, but at laſt were diſcovered and informed againſt by Mr John Park the curate of Carridden and the curate of Borrowſtounneſs; for the curates were very diligent in informing againſt the wanderers. Middleton the governor of Blackneſs, who was a papiſt, came to the houſe where they were, as if he had been a ſtranger, and pretended a great deal of reſpect for Mr Cargill, begged leave to drink a glaſs of wine with them. At laſt, drawing his ſword, he told them they were his priſoners, and called the houſe to his aſſiſtance; however, none regarded him except one Thomas George. Mr Hall ſtruggled hard with the governor, till Mr Cargill made his eſcape, notwithſtanding his being wounded. Mr Hall would likewiſe have got off, but Thomas George knocked him on the head with the doghead of his carbine, by which he was mortally wounded. However, the townwomen came in a body, and conveyed him out of the town. But ſuch was the nature of his wound, that, not being able to walk far, he fainted, and was obliged to be carried to the next country houſe belonging to one Robert Punton. Dalziel, in the mean time, whoſe houſe of Binns was in the neighbourhood, came with a party of the guards and apprehended him. And though every body ſaw he was a dying, yet Dalziel would carry him directly to Edinburgh; but he died among their hands before they got thither. His corpſe were laid in the Canongate tolbooth for three days without burial; neither could his friends be ſuffered to do this laſt office for him, till at laſt he was buried in the night-time. When Mr Hall was taken, there was found in his pocket an unſubſcribed paper, called, from the place where it was found, The Queenſferry paper, of which I ſhall give the following abſtract.

Abſtract of the Queenſferry paper.

WE underſubſcribers, for ourſelves and all that ſhall adhere to us—are reſolved—to bind ourſelves with a ſolemn and ſacred bond,—declaring thoſe and no thing but thoſe, to be our preſent purpoſes. 1. We covenant and ſwear, that we acknowlege and avouch the only true and living God, Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt, to be our God, and that we cloſe with his way of redemption by his Son Jeſus Chriſt,—and that we acknowlege the Old and New Teſtaments to be by divine revelation, and to contain the will of God to man, &c. 2. That we ſhall, to the utmoſt of our power, advance the kingdom of God, (if at any time God ſhall give us power) by eſtabliſhing, throughout the lands, righteouſneſs and the true reformed religion, in—its doctrine—worſhip—diſcipline and government; and that we ſhall free the land from—prelacy on the one hand,—and eraſtianiſm on the other. 3. That we confeſs with our mouth, and believe with the heart, that the doctrine of the reformed churches, eſpecially that of Scotland, contained in the ſcriptures, ſummed up in our Confeſſions of Faith, and engaged to by us in our covenants, is the only true doctrine of God; and that we purpoſe to perſevere in it to the end.—4. That we ſhall endeavour, to our utmoſt, the overthrow of the kingdom of darkneſs, and whatever is contrary to the kingdom of Chriſt, eſpecially idolatry and popery—ſuperſtition, will worſhip and prelacy,—and eraſtianiſm,—and execute righteous judgment impartially, according to the word of God and degree of offences, upon the committers of theſe things eſpecially, to wit, blaſphemy, idolatry, lary, atheism, buggery, sorcery, perjury, &c.—5. Seriously considering, that the hand of our kings and rulers with them hath been a long time against the throne of the Lord,—the power and purity of our religion—and Christ's reigning over his church,—and that there is no more speedy way of relaxation from the wrath of God, (that hath ever lien heavy on us since we engaged with him) but of rejecting them, who have so manifestly rejected God,—disclaiming the covenants with God,—governing contrary to all right laws divine and human,—and to all the ends of government,—seeing they have stopt the course of law and justice—and have made butcheries and murders on the Lord's people, sold them as slaves, &c. and that upon no other account but for maintaining Christ's right of ruling over their conscience against usurpations of men, for fulfilling their vows, &c. for—1. Our ancestors neither did, nor could bind us; they did not buy their liberty and conquest with our thraldom and slavery; —neither did they bind us to any thing but to a government which they esteemed best for the commonwealth and subjects; and when this ceaseth we are free to chuse another.—2. The covenant—only binds us to maintain our king in the maintenance of the true established and covenanted religion—without the swearing and sealing of which our fathers, or rather we ourselves, refused to receive him for king, or them for rulers; and—we are free to reject him upon his renouncing of it.—3. Neither is there any hopes of their returning from these sinful courses,—having so often renewed their purposes and promises of persevering in those crimes: and, suppose they should dissemble a repentance,—yet they cannot now be believed, after they have violated all ties that human wisdom can devise to bind men. And, besides, who sees not somewhat of folly to be in this, to think to bind a king that pretends to absoluteness?—We then do reject that king, and those associate with him in the government, from being our king and rulers;—they having altered and destroyed the Lord's established religion, overturned the fundamental and established laws of the kingdom—and changed the civil government,—into tyranny—We then —do declare, that we shall set up over our selves, and over what God should give us power of, government and governors according to the word of God, and especially that word, Exod. xviii. 21.—that we shall no more commit the government—to any one single person, or lineal successor, we not being by God, as the Jews were, bound to one single family,—that kind being liable to most inconveniencies, and apteſt to degenerate into tyranny,—Moreover, we declare, that those men, whom we shall set over us, shall be engaged to govern us, principally by that civil and judicial law (not that which is ceremonial or typical) given by God to his people of Israel.—6. It being the work of the ministers of the gospel to preach—and defend the kingdom of God, and to preserve the doctrine discipline, &c. of the same, from all corruptions and encroachments of rulers and all others; and seeing the greatest part of ministers were not only defective in preaching against the acts of the rulers for overthrowing religion and reformation, but—hindered those who were willing and inforced some that did it, &c. &c. we declare, that we neither can nor will hear preaching, nor receive sacraments from any of these ministers,—nor from any who have encouraged and strengthened their hands, by hearing and pleading for them.—7.—We declare, that a gospel ministry is a standing ordinance of God,—and that none of us shall take upon him the preaching of the word, or administring of the sacraments, unless called and ordained thereto—And yet separation cannot be imputed to us; there is both malice and ignorance in the calumny; for if there be a separation, it must be where the change is, and that is not in us. We are not separating from the communion of the church, and setting up new ordinances and a new ministry, but cleaving to the same ministers and the same ordinances, where others have slidden back to new ways, and have a new authority superadded, which is like the new piece on the old garment. 8. We bind and oblige ourselves to defend ourselves, and one another, in our worshipping of God, and in our natural, civil and divine rights and liberties;—and if we shall be pursued or troubled, in our worshipping, rights and liberties,—we shall look on that as a declaring war, and take all the advantages that one enemy doth of another,—but not to trouble or injure any, but those that have injured us.'

Thus then is the substance of that paper called, The Queensferry paper. It was but a rude draught, and unsubscribed, and had not been consulted upon by the rest of the community. Whether there were just grounds for the severe things said against the governors at that time must be left with the reader. As to their disowning the king's authority, we shall have occasion to consider that afterwards; but, for their taking upon them to alter the form of government, and introduce a new constitution, I do not see how to vindicate it; only this must be said, that it was a rude draught, and the contents of it had never been deliberated upon.

The reader will observe, that, after the defeat at Bothwell, they who opposed the indulged kept by themselves, not being able to comply or countenance those that did accept the indulgence: and however they were blamed for running into heights and excesses, yet this must be said, That some of the greatest lengths, as my author calls them, such as renouncing the authority that then was, in less than ten years after this, had the approbation of the whole nation. That in some things they might have been wrong, who can wonder at it, considering the time in which their lot was cast?

On the 4th of June the council enjoined the general to send a sufficient number of soldiers to queensferry, for guarding the passages and apprehending those that should be informed against, together with two of the magistrates who refused to suppress the tumult, and other suspected persons, and indemnified them in case of slaughter; and ordered the advocate to prosecute before the justiciary, Anne Hamilton lady Gilchristlengh, and James Thomson tenant in Tankertoun parish, for harbouring the murderers of the archbishop.

On the 10th one Margaret Wauch was brought in prisoner from Queensferry, for being accessory to Mr Cargil's escape. When he got out, though much wounded, during the confusion about Mr Hall, he retired to a private place on the south side of the town. A certain woman, finding him there, tyed up his wounds with her head clothes and conducted him to James Punton's in Carlowrie, where he lay in the barn all night. Mrs Punton gave him some warm milk, and a surgeon happening to come to the house dressed his wounds. General Dalziel came and took James Punton in Kirkliston, where, being accused by the curate for shewing kindness to such a rebel as he called Mr Cargill, he was carried to Edinburgh, where he lay in prison three months, and payed 1000 merks fine.

The same day the council received a letter from the king, dated at Windsor the 14th of May last, wherein his majesty, after expatiating against field-conventicles, as the causes of rebellion, and signifying his resolution to preserve the sacred order of episcopacy, &c. declared that he was resolved to continue the indulgence for some time; but then that he had thought fit to send these instructions: 1. They were to suffer none to preach who had been banished from any parish or corporation in England; or who, since the last indemnity, had preached in places constructed field meetings, or who could not certify their ordination before the 29th of June last, or who did not receive their licence from them. In short, they were to indulge none upon the north side of the river Tay. 2. They were to suffer no meeting house to be within a mile of a parish church, and to pull down such as were, especially that at Newbottle. 3. They were to suffer none to preach in the parishes where they were formerly ministers. 4. No indulged minister must preach nor baptize out of their own parishes, or take upon them to marry any persons, that being restricted to the regular incumbents. 5. None is to be indulged where the generality are regular or orderly, i. e. Episcopalian. 6. No indulged ministers are to be suffered to keep presbyteries or synods, these being the grand nurseries of schism and sedition. 7. The families of irregular ejected ministers [such as would have none of their indulgences] must be removed from Edinburgh, St. Andrews and Glasgow. 8. As by a former proclamation no nonconformists were to preach in Edinburgh burgh, nor two miles round it, so lest that city should be corrupted in its religion and loyalty, none of these preachers were to be suffered within 12 miles of it; and if the council had given any such licences, they were to revoke them. 9. They were to protect the regular ministers.

In pursuance of these instructions, which, in effect, repealed the indulgence, the council that same day recalled Mr Johnston's licence at Newbottle, and ordered his meeting house to be pulled down, which was accordingly done; and the timber and seats were sold at 10 l. ster. ing; 8 l. 6 s. 8 d. was given to the poor of the parish, and the rest to the people employed in executing these orders. The meeting houses in Kilpatrick, Longtoun Prestonhaugh, Orwal, Ceres, &c. were all ordered to be shut up, and the council gave an account of their diligence in their majesty's service in a letter to the king.

These proceedings bring to my mind what the marquis of Argyll, when under sentence of death, said to some ministers 'My skill fails me, if you who are ministers will not either suffer much or sin much; for, though you go along with these men in part, if you do it not in all things, you are but where you were, and so must suffer.' I do not in the least question that many worthy and valuable persons complied with the indulgence, but they found that no partial compliances could satisfy; and as for those who would make no compliances, yea, resisted even to blood, though their sufferings were the most severe, yet they had this for their comfort, stedfastness in their principles and peace of conscience.

On the 14th of June the advocate appeared against L. Bargeny, and offered an additional libel or accusation, signifying that his lordship had spoken in favour of the murder of the archbishop; but an act of council was produced ordering him to be set at liberty, since he had found bail to appear when called; upon which the process was dropt; for the king had likeways wrote in his favour. He was accordingly released. The whole process was malicious. Bishop Burnet says, 'When he was at liberty he discovered a conspiracy in which Halton and others were concerned. They had practised on some who had been in that rebellion to swear that he and several others were engaged in it, and that they had sent them out to join in it. They promised these witnesses a large share in the confiscated estates if they went through in the business. Depositions were prepared for them, and they promised to swear to them: upon which a day was fixed for their trial; but the hearts of these witnesses failed them or their consciences rose upon them; so that, when the day came, they could not bring themselves to swear against an innocent man, and they plainly refused it.' In short, after all practices of this kind, Bargeny was at last released.

After Mr Cargil escaped at Queensferry, he fled south, where several of his friends were wandering and concealing themselves; for the reader must know that all these wanderers were outlawed and declared rebels. Mr Richard Cameron and some others, after several meetings among themselves for forming a declaration and testimony they were to publish to the world, at last agreed upon one; and about twenty persons came armed to the small burgh of Sanquhar, where Michael Cameron read the declaration at the cross, and left a copy affixed there, as follows.

The declaration and testimony of the true Presbyterian, Anti prelatic, Anti-erastian, persecuted party in Scotland, published at Sanquhar June 22. 1680.

IT is not among the smallest of the Lord's mercies to this poor land, that there have always been some who have given their testimony against every course of defection we were guilty of which is a token for good, that he doth not intend to cast us off altogether, but that he will leave a remnant in whom he will be glorious, if they, through his grace, keep themselves clean, and walk in his ways and methods, as they have been walked in and owned by our predecessors, of truly worthy memory, in their carrying on our noble work of reformation in the several steps thereof, both from popery and prelacy, and likeways from erastian supremacy, so much usurped by him, who, it is true, so far as we know, is descended from the race of our kings; yet he hath as far deborded from what he ought to have been, by his perjury and usurping in church-matters, and tyranny in matters civil, as is known by the whole land, that we have just reason to account it among the Lord's great controversies against us, that we have not disowned him, and the men of his practices, whether inferior magistrates, or any other, as enemies to our Lord Jesus and his crown, and the true protestant and presbyterian interest in these lands, our Lords espoused bride and church. Therefore, although we be for government and governors, such as the word of God and our covenants allow; yet we, for ourselves, and all that will adhere to us, the representatives of the true presbyterian church, and covenanted nation of Scotland, considering the great hazard of lying under sin any longer, do, by thir presents, disown Charles Stuart, who hath been reigning these years bygone, or rather, we may say, tyrannizing, on the throne of Britain, as having any right, title, or interest to or in the said crown of Scotland or government, as forfeited several years since by his perjury and breach of covenant with God, and his church, and usurpation of his crown and royal prerogative, and many other breaches in matters ecclesiastic, and by his tyranny and breaches in the very rules of government in matters civil. For which reasons we declare, that, several years since, he should have been denuded of being king, ruler, or magistrate, or of having any power to act, or to be obeyed as such. As also we, under the banner of our Lord Jesus Christ, the captain of our salvation, do declare a war with such a tyrant and usurper, and all the men of these practices, as enemies to our Lord Jesus Christ, and his cause and covenant; and against all such as have any way strengthened him, sided with, or acknowledged him, in his usurpation, civil and ecclesiastic; yea, and against all such as shall any ways strengthen, side with, or acknowledge him, or any other, in the like usurpation and tyranny; far more against such as would betray or deliver up our free and reformed church into the bondage of antichrist the Pope of Rome. And by this we homologate our testimony, at Rutherglen, the 29th of May 1679, and all the faithful testimonies of those that have gone before us, as also of those who have suffered of late.' Also we disclaim that declaration published at Hamilton the 13th of June 1679, chiefly because it takes in the king's interest, which we are, several years since, loosed from; as also, because of the foresaid reasons, and others that we may after this (if the Lord will) publish. As also we disown and resent the reception of the duke of York, a professed Papist, as repugnant to our principles and vows to the Most High God, and as that which is the great, though (alas!) the just reproach of our church. We also, by this, protest against his succeeding to the crown, as against whatever hath been done, or any are essaying to do in this land given to the Lord, in prejudice to our work of reformation. And, to conclude, we hope after this none will blame us, or offend at our rewarding of those that are against us, as they have done to us, as the Lord gives the opportunity. This is not to exclude any that have declined, if they be willing to give satisfaction according to the degree of offence.

It is scarce worth while to take notice of the false and indistinct account given of this matter by bishop Burnet, who represents those, whom he calls Cargillites, as being acted by a strange spirit of fury, and that they affixed their declaration to the cross of Dumfries, since it was at Sanquhar, from whence their declaration had its name and which exposed them not only to the cruelty of their enemies, but even to the censures of those who should have been their friends. Though every expression in their declaration was not so well chosen, yet that which was most cried out against is not incapable of being defended. They disowned the king's authority, and they gave their reasons for so doing, viz. his breaking all his engagements, overturning the constitution both in church and state, depriving his subjects, not only of their liberties and properties but likeways of the free exercise of their religion, by claiming and assuming an absolute tyrannical and arbitrary government. If matters were as they misrepresented, and the reader is to judge, from the former part of this history, whether they were or not, then it is certain that the conduct of the whole island at the revolution, justifies their disowning the authority that then was. 'It is certainly unlawful, says an ingenious modern author, to resist government; but it is certainly lawful, to resist the deviation from government. To resist the abuse of government is to assist government. It is allowed to be just to help our protectors; but it is equally just to oppose our enemies, madmen and spoilers. Now what was Nero, what Caligula and Claudius? The one a bloody idiot, the other two inhuman madmen.—if their course of cruelties and oppression was government, as are plagues, tempests and inundations; but if their lives and actions were altogether pernicious and detestable, the exterminating such monsters from among men would have been a service to the whole race.' And a little farther he says, 'What avail laws or liberty, ever so excellently framed, when they are at the mercy of lawless rage and caprice? If we are forbid by God to do kind laws, why do we make them? Is it not unlawful to make what is unlawful to defend? What else is the end of government but the felicity of men? and why are some raised higher in society than others, but that all may be happy?—What more right had Nero to take away the lives of innocent men than any other assassin, what more title to their fortunes than any other robber? What better right to spill their blood than any other tyger? And is it unlawful to resist robbers and assassins and beasts of prey? Did the Almighty ever say of that beastly tyrant, Touch not Nero mine anointed, and do his ruffians no harm? And as the Rev. Author of the Hind let Loose says, Though it is not the prudence of the management, but the justice of the action, that I would have vindicated from obloquies, yet nothing was wanting but success to justify both. From the whole I think I may assert, that it was from the vigorous prosecution of the principles upon which these men acted, that the nation owed the revolution, and the happiness of the protestant succession. It was therefore a pity that they had so few to take their part and espouse their cause, especially of those who were under the same covenant engagements with them. Had all the presbyterians in Scotland remained united and continued in opposing erastianism, as well as popery, none, humanly speaking, would have had occasion to accuse these men of going heights and lengths, and what not. As for their protestations against the succession of the duke of York, it was no more than what was done by these worthy English patriots who promoted the bill of exclusion. If the reader wants a further vindication of these men, I must refer him to their own informatory vindication, the Hind let Loose and Jus Populi Vindicatum, and proceed in the history of matters of fact.

When the account of the above declaration came to the council, they wrote to Lauderdale, June 30, wherein, as might be expected, they branded these poor people with the names of villains, ruffians, the scum of the people; and the same day published a proclamation for apprehending Mr Donald Cargill, Mr Richard Cameron and his brother, Mr Thomas Douglas, John Vallange, Dan. Mackitchell, Tho. Campbell, John Moodie, Pat. Gemble, James Stewart, Alex. Gordon, Francis Johnstoun, and —— Crichton. In order to this there was not only a prize set upon each of them, for the better encouragement of all who should be at pains to apprehend them, but likewise all heritors, &c. in the south and west shires, were to call all who dwelt within the bounds of their estates, from 16 years of age and upwards, to swear whether they saw any of these persons, or discovered any lurking or concealing themselves, under the pain of being looked upon as traitors themselves.

Jointly with this proclamation they ordered Dalziel to send out parties to search for and apprehend the last mentioned persons, and bring them in dead or alive, and to call to his assistance any of the nobility and gentry, with their dependants, as he should see proper.

The people concerned in the Sanquhar declaration, perceiving the preparations against them, entered into the following bond of mutual defence, subscribed by Mr Richard Cameron, his brother Michael, Archibald Stewart, John Potter, and about 30 more, which was found on Mr Cameron when he was killed at Airsmoss.

'We underscribers bind and oblige ourselves to be faithful to God, and true to one another and to all others who shall join with us, in adhering to the Rutherglen testimony, and disclaiming the Hamilton declaration, chiefly because it takes in the king's interest, which we are loosed from by reason of his perfidy and covenant breaking, both to the most high God, and the people over whom he was set upon the terms of his propagating the main ends of the covenants, viz. the reformation of religion; and, instead of that, usurping to himself the royal prerogatives of Jesus Christ, and encroaching upon the liberties of the church; and so stating himself in opposition to Jesus Christ the Mediator, and the free government of his house; and also in disowning and protesting against the reception of the duke of York, a profest papist, and whatever else hath been done in this land (given to the Lord) in prejudice of our covenanted and universally sworn to reformation. And although, as the Lord who searcheth the heart knows, we be for government and governors, both civil and ecclesiastic, such as the word of God and our covenants allow, yet by this we disown the present magistrates, who openly and avowedly are doing what in them lies for destroying utterly our work of reformation from popery, prelacy, erastianism, and other heresies and errors; and by this we declare also, that we are not any more to own ministers indulged, and such as drive a sinful union with them; nor are we to join any more in this public cause with ministers, or professors of any rank, that are guilty of the defections of this time, until they give satisfaction proportioned to the scandal and offence they have given.'

On the first of July a process was commenced against the earl of Tweeddale, for a meeting in the town barn belonging to his lordship in the town of Inverkeithing; but, as the barn held of the town, the earl was acquitted, and the magistrates fined in 501. sterling, which the inhabitants were obliged to pay. The same day Mess. Will. Row and Jo. Gray, not having proper licences, were discharged from preaching, and Mess. George Hamilton and James Rymer, not appearing to answer for their preaching in several places, were denounced and put to the horn.

On the 6th the earl of Rothes was made a duke; and the following gentlemen were forfeited in absence for their supposed accession to Bothwel, viz. John Bell of Whitefide, John Gibson of Auchinchyne, —— Gibson younger of Inglistoun, —— Gordon of Dundeugh, — Grier of Dalgoner, — Smith of Kilroy, — MacClellan of Balmagagachan, Thomas Bogle of Boglesholе, Baird younger of Dungeon hill, Gordon of Craig, Lenox of Irelandtoun, Gordon of Barharrow, John Fullertoun of Auchinharr, David MacCulloch son to Ardwell, William Whitehead of Millhouse, John Welsh of Corsley, — Neilson of Corsack, Robert MacClellan of Barscob, and his brother Samuel, — Fullertoun of Nethermill, Geo. MacKartney of Blaiket, — Gordon of Garrery, — Gordon of Knockgray, — Herron of Little-park, Gordon of Holm, Gordon of Overbar, John MacNaught of Colquhad, Murdoch, alias laird Murdoch, and John Bunning of Dalvennan. Many others were forfeited whose names are not known, and many were declared fugitives. And, to conclude the affair of the forfeitures,

My author, from written accounts from Galloway, tells us, that Alex. Hunter of Colquhasben was forfeited, and his estate given to the countess of Nithsdale a papist, A. Hay of Ardwallen was likewise forfeited, and his estate given to the same popish family. His mother, a pious gentlewoman of 80 years of age, was imprisoned for nonconformity, and her annuity given to the said popish family. Thus the duke of York and his creatures were making way for the introduction of popery, so low was the reformation brought under the tyranny of prelacy.

On the 15th of July, John Niven shipmaster was prosecuted for saying at Brunt-island, 'That the duke of York had been upon a plot for taking away his majesty's life, and had contrived with the king of France to invade England with an army, and had come to Scotland to make a party and faction, and to introduce popery.' They wrote to to London before they passed sentence, though he was found guilty. At last he was condemned to be hanged on the 18th of August; but the king, at the intercession of his dear brother, ordered the sentence to be suspended, and that he continue in prison during pleasure. On the 19th Alex. Ross was condemned for being in the rebellion; but, upon his casting himself on the king's mercy, and promising to take the oaths, obtained a remission.

CHAP. IV.

Of the skirmish at Airsmoss: the execution of Mr Hackstoun of Rathillet, and others; the Torwood excommunication, with the proceedings of the council upon it, and other branches of persecution to the end of the year.

WHile the soldiers were ranging up and down the country, in quest of the wanderers, a remarkable skirmish happened at Airsmoss, in the parish of Auchinleck in Kyle. On the 20th of July, Bruce of Earlshall, commanding Lord Airly's troops and Strachan's dragoons, having information from Sir John Cochran of Ochiltree where Mr Cameron and several of his followers were, came upon them with great expedition and fury, about four o'clock. Perceiving the enemies approach, and that there was no possibility of escape, Mr Cameron, after a short prayer, encouraged them to fight in their own defence. The dragoons that came upon them were about 120, whereas the persecuted people were only about 40 foot, indifferently armed, and 26 horse. Mr Hackstoun and Mr Cameron commanded the horse, who all behaved with great bravery; but were overpowered and broken by a vast superiority of numbers; the former was wounded and taken prisoner, and the latter was killed. There were in all nine killed on the spot, viz. Mr Richard Cameron and his brother Michael, capt. John Fowler, John Gemble, John Hamilton, Rob. Dick, Tho. Watson, Rob. Paterson in Kirkhill of Cambusnethan, a singularly pious youth, and Jam. Gray younger of Christoun, who was a youth of good parts and eminent piety. Mr Cameron was observed to pray, when he had the prospect of this engagement, 'Lord, take the ripest, and spare the greenest,' which was evidently to be seen in this pious youth. The soldiers owned he was the person who mauled them most. Several were wounded. — Manuel of Shots died of his wounds, as he entered the tolbooth of Edinburgh, and John Vallange died on the day following. Archibald Alison in the parish of Evandale and Jo. Malcolm in the parish of Dairy were taken prisoners, as was one John Pollock, who was put in the boots, and endured the torture with great firmness and resolution, and was afterwards banished. Bishop Burnet was misinformed in saying that Mr Cargill was taken here.

When Mr Cameron was killed, his head and hands were cut off by Robert Murray, and carried into the council, who ordered them to be set up on the Netherbow port of Edinburgh. It is said that Earlshall gave a guinea for this piece of service. John Fowler's head was cut off through mistake, instead of Michael Cameron's. When Earlshall came to Edinburgh, he ordered the heads to be taken out of the bag in which they were carried, put them upon a halbert, and carried them to the council. Robert Murray said, There is the head and hands that lived praying and preaching, and died praying and fighting. Mr Cameron's father being in the tolbooth of Edinburgh, they carried them to him to add to his sorrow, and enquired if he knew them. He took his son's head and hands and kissed them, and said, I know them, they are my son's, my dear son's. It is the will of the Lord; good is the will of the Lord, who cannot wrong me nor mine, but has made goodness and mercy to follow us all our days. Mr Cameron's head was fixed on the port, and his hands by his head, with his fingers upward.

Thus the famous Mr Cameron fell a sacrifice to prelatic fury, and died a martyr for religion and liberty. It was from him that these tossed and persecuted people were afterwards nick-named Cameronians. He was a zealous preacher, not only against prelacy, but also against the indulgence, following the example of Mr John Welwood and Mr John Kid. For a farther account of him the reader may consult P. Walker's remarkable passages of his life, who was a sufferer in this period, and the appendix to the Cloud of Witnesses. Mr Cargill, the Sabbath following, preached from 2 Sam. iii. 38.

On the 23d of July Mr Rule was appointed to be set at liberty, upon giving a bond of 500 merks to leave the kingdom in eight days. Accordingly he went abroad, studied physic, and took his degrees; after which he came and lived in Berwick, where he was very useful. While there the earl of Home formed a design to apprehend him, because, when visiting the laird of Houndwood's family, he expounded a chapter, which was constructed keeping of a conventicle; but he providentially escaped, though Houndwood was fined in 100 merks. See the account given of him by the Rev. and worthy Dr Calamy, in his abridgment of Baxter's life, Vol. II. p. 517.

On the 24th the magistrates of Glasgow were ordered to turn all the non-conform preachers out of town, and suffer none of them to live within a mile of it.

The same day, being informed of the taking of Rathillet and the other prisoners, they ordered the magistrates of Edinburgh to receive him at the Water-gate, to set him on a bare horse, with his face to the tail, to tye his feet under the horse's belly, and his hands with ropes; that the executioner go before him covered, carrying Mr Cameron's head on a halbert, and leading the horse up the high-street to the common prison; that the other three prisoners be conducted on foot bare-headed after him, with their hands tied to a goad of iron; that no meat be given to Rathillet, but what should be prepared by the master of the jail, nor any permitted to speak with him, or any letters conveyed to him.

In a letter to his friend, he says, That he was carried up to the parliament close, and brought before the council, where the chancellor read an indictment against him; first concerning the bishop's murder, to which he answered, That he was obliged by no law, either of God or man, to answer to it, either by accusing himself, or impeaching others. Being asked if he thought it murder, he told them, That he was not obliged to answer such questions, yet he would not call it so, but rather say it was no murder. Being farther asked, if he owned the king's authority, he replied, That though he was not obliged to answer, yet, being permitted to speak, he would say something to that; and first, 'That there could be no lawful authority but what was of God; and that no authority stated in a direct opposition to God, could be of God; and that he knew no authority nor justiciary this day in these nations, but what were in a direct opposition to God, and so could neither be of God, nor lawful; and that their fruits were kything it, in that they were setting buggerers, murderers, sorcerers, and such others, at liberty from justice, and employing them in their service, and made it their whole work to oppress, kill, and destroy the Lord's people.' This enraged the chancellor and the rest so much, that they required him to give an instance. He answered, 'Though it were enough to instance my such when he saw a judicature to execute justice, yet he would instance one; and accordingly mentioned a buggerer released at the sheriff court of Fife, and employed in their service; and offered to prove it, notwithstanding all their rage. Bishop Paterson asked, If ever Pilate and that judicature, who were direct enemies to Christ, were disowned by him as judges? he said, He would answer no perjured prelate in the nation. Paterson replied, He could not be called perjured, since he never took that sacrilegious covenant. Mr Hackstoun told him, that God would own that covenant when none of them were to oppose it. A good deal more passed to the same purpose, which the reader may see in the Cloud of Witnesses. Notwithstanding his bold and open answers, he was threatened with torture, which he no way regarded.

On the 26th the affair of absence from the king's host was taken out of the hands of the justiciary, and put into those of the council, which was a more arbitrary court; and the following gentlemen, viz. Dundas of Borthwick, the laird of Riddel, Geo. Douglas Bonjedburgh, Ker of Cherrytrees, James Scot of Thirlestane, Francis Scot of Greenhill, P. Wardlaw, Robert Brown of Blackburn, Pringle of Greenknows, Alex. Home of St Bathans, Sir. Spence, Clappertoun of Wylieclengh, George Home of Bassenden, Baſſenden, were fined in above 2201 l. ſterling. Many others were fined for the ſame cauſe; and about the end of this year the council ordered all found guilty of abſence to be kept in cuſtody, for the future, till their fines be diſcharged.

Mr Hackſtoun was again before the council this day, and anſwered much to the ſame purpoſe as before, and on the 27th was before the juſticiary, when, as he ſays himſelf in another letter to his friend, 'He declined the king's authority, as an uſurper of the prerogatives of the Son of God, whereby he hath involved the lands in idolatry, perjury, and other wickedneſſes and declined them, (as exerciſing under him the ſupreme power over the church uſurped from Jeſus Chriſt) who, in carrying on their deſigns of confirming themſelves in their uſurpations of the crown of Chriſt, had ſhed ſo much innocent blood through the land; and therefore he durſt not, with his own conſent, ſuſtain them as competent judges, but declared them as open and ſtated enemies to the living God, and competitors for his throne and power belonging only to him.

On the 29th, the day before he was brought to his trial, the council, in a moſt unprecedented manner, appointed the manner of his execution. On Friday the 30th, being again brought before the juſticiary, and being aſked if he had any thing more to ſay, he anſwered, That which I have ſaid I will ſeal it. Then they told him that they had ſomething to ſay to him, and commanded him to ſit down and receive his ſentence, which he did; and he told them, 'They were all murderers; for all that power they had was derived from tyranny; and that, theſe years by gone, they had not only tyrannized over the church of God, but had alſo 'grinded the faces of the poor;' ſo that oppreſſion, bloodſhed, perjury, and many murders were to be found in their ſkirts.'

Upon this he was condemned, and carried from the bar to the place of execution. None were ſuffered to be with him but two of the bailies, the executioner, and his ſervants. He was permitted to pray; but not to ſpeak to the people. His right hand was firſt cut off; and a little after his left; which he endured with great firmneſs and conſtancy. The hangman being long in cutting off his right hand, Mr Hackſtoun deſired him to ſtrike in the joint of the left; but ſpoke no ſuch thing as biſhop Burnet repreſents, 'That when his hands were cut off, he ſhould, like one unconcerned, if his feet muſt be cut off likewiſe.' He was next drawn up to the top of the gallows with a pulley, and, ſays the Cloud of Witneſſes, was ſuffered to fall down a very conſiderable way, upon the lower ſcaffold, three times, with his whole weight; then he was fixed at the top of the gallows, and the executioner, with a large knife, cutting open his breaſt, pulled out his heart before he was dead; for it moved when it fell on the ſcaffold. He then ſtuck his knife in it, ſhewed it on all ſides to the people, crying, Here is the heart of a traitor. At laſt he threw it in a fire prepared on purpoſe, with his other inwards; and, having quartered his body, his head was fixed on the Nether-bow, one of his quarters, with his hands, at St Andrews, another at Glaſgow, a third at Leith, and a fourth at Brunt-iſland. Thus fell David Hackſtoun of Rathillet, eſq; a gentleman related to ſome of the principal families in Scotland, and a perſon of eminent piety and courage.

On the 4th of Auguſt, John Malcolm in the parith of Dairy in Galloway, and Archibald Aliſon in the parith of Evandale in Clydſdale, two other priſoners taken at Airſmoſs, were ſentenced to be hanged on the 11th inſtant in the Grafs-market, which was executed accordingly. Their teſtimonies are both in the Cloud of Witneſſes, wherein they ſhew the reaſons of their conduct, and declare their conſtant adherence to the covenanted work of reformation againſt popery, prelacy, eraſtianiſm, and tyranny. Thus all the priſoners taken at Airſmoſs, except John Pollock, were executed, as above.

Mean while, on the ſaid 4th of Auguſt, another commitee for public affairs was appointed, conſiſting of the archbiſhop of St Andrews, the earl of Linlithgow, the biſhop of Edinburgh, the preſident, Collingtoun, Lundin, Kildry, the officers of ſtate, or any three of them, with the former powers; and the former endeavours for diſcovering thoſe concerned in Bothwell were enforced with new orders. The reader perhaps may think it tireſome to purſue the various and repeated commiſſions granted in order to apprehend thoſe concerned in the late riſing.

During theſe things many parties of ſoldiers were ſent through the country to quarter in the weſt and ſouth, to be in readineſs when any of the perſecuted party were heard of; and none of them were more eager, than one captain Inglis, in ſearching for thoſe who had been hearers of Mr Cameron or Mr Cargill; Robert Cannon of Mountdroggat, once a profeſſor, was very uſeful to the ſoldiers in diſcovering the lurking places of the poor wanderers; and about this time he was made collector of the ceſs and exciſe in Carſphairn and the neighbourhood; and as he was pretty much acquainted, ſo, when the ſoldiers ſeized ſuſpected perſons, Cannon was ſent for, and they were kept or let go according to his direction. Courts likewiſe were held at New-Galloway, and other places, for the trial of thoſe who had the misfortune to fall into their hands; but, as the heritors were not very cordial in theſe things, the officers of the army took the work upon themſelves, and put many to their oaths in a moſt arbitrary and unprecedented manner.

In conſequence of the opinion of the laſt made committee, on the firſt of September, Mr James Ker and Mr Arthur Dougal were ordered to be releaſed upon bail, but Mr John Dickſon, late miniſter of Rutherglen, was ſent firſt to priſon at Edinburgh, and from thence to the Baſs, where he continued ſeveral years. By a letter from the king, of the third, the common people, who had been concerned in Bothwell, had to the firſt of March next to take the bond; but heritors, miniſters, ringleaders, &c. were ſtill excepted.

Mr Cargill was now the only perſon who ventured to preach in the fields, notwithſtanding the ſanguinary laws againſt that practice, and who proſecuted the teſtimony for religion and liberty in that manner; and conſidering all the preachings, proteſtations, and declarations againſt the wickedneſs and tyranny of thoſe who had the adminiſtration of the government in their hands, and that both the defenſive arms of men, and the Chriſtian arms of prayers, &c. had been uſed, yet that of eccleſiaſtical cenſure had not been authoritatively exerted; therefore, though he could not have the concurrence of his brethren to ſtrengthen the ſolemnity of the action, yet did he not think that defect, in this broken ſtate of the church, could diſable his authority, or leſſen the duty. Accordingly, in September or October this year, he had a large meeting at the Torwood in Stirlingſhire, when he pronounced the ſentence of excommunication againſt ſome of the moſt violent perſecutors of that day, as formally as the preſent ſtate of things could permit; and in doing this he gave them the ordinary names by which they were called, that they all might know who the perſons were.

After he had lectured upon Ezekiel xxi. 25. 26. 27. and preached from 1 Cor. v. 13. he diſcourſed a little concerning the nature of excommunication, and declaring that he was not acted from any ſpirit of revenge, but merely from the conſtraint of conſcience; he then pronounced the following ſentence;

I being a miniſter of Jeſus Chriſt, and having authority and power from him, do, in his name, and by his Spirit, excommunicate, caſt out of the true church, and deliver up to Satan, Charles II. king, &c. and that upon the account of theſe grounds following: 1. For his high mocking of God, in that, after he had acknowleged his own ſins, his father's ſins, his mother's idolatry, he hath, notwithſtanding, gone on more avowedly in thoſe ſins than all that went before him. 2. For his perjury, in that after he had, twice at leaſt, ſolemnly ſubſcribed that covenant, he did ſo preſumptuouſly renounce, diſown, and command it to be burned by the hands of the hangman. 3. Becauſe he hath reſcinded all laws for eſtabliſhing of that religion and reformation engaged to in that covenant, and enacted laws for eſtabliſhing its contrary, and is ſtill working for the introducing popery into thir lands. 4. For commanding of armies to deſtroy the Lord's people, who were ſtanding in their own juſt defence, and for their privileges and rights, againſt the tyrannies rannies, oppreſſions and injuries of men, and for the blood he hath ſhed in fields, on ſcaffolds, and on ſeas, of the people of God, on account of religion and righteouſneſs, (they being moſt willing in all other things to render him obedience, if he had reigned and ruled them according to his covenant and oath) more than all the kings that have been before him in Scotland. 5. That he hath been ſtill an enemy to, a perſecutor of the true proteſtants, a favourer and helper of the papiſts, both at home and abroad; and hath hindered, to the utmoſt of his power, the due execution of juſt laws againſt them. 6. For his relaxing of his kingdom, by his frequent grant of remiſſions and pardons for murderers, (which is in the power of no king to do, being expreſly contrary to the law of God) which was the ready way to embolden men in committing of murders, to the defiling the land with blood. Laſtly, To paſs by all other things, his great and dreadful uncleanneſs of adultery and inceſt, his drunkenneſs, his diſſembling with God and man, and performing his promiſes where his engagements were ſinful, &c. Next,

By the ſame authority, and in the ſame name, I excommunicate, &c. James Duke of York, &c. and that for his idolatries, (for I ſhall not ſpeak of any other ſins but what have been perpetrate in Scotland) and for ſetting up idolatry in Scotland, to defile the Lord's land, and his inticeing and encouraging others ſo to do, &c.

Next, in the ſame manner, &c. I excommunicate, &c. James Duke of Monmouth, &c, for coming into Scotland, upon his father's unjuſt command, and leading armies againſt the Lord's people, who were conſtrained to riſe, being killed in and for the right worſhipping of the true God, and for his refuſing, that morning at Bothwell-bridge, a ceſſation of arms, for hearing and redreſſing their injuries, wrongs and oppreſſions, &c.

Next, I do, by the ſame authority, &c. excommunicate, &c. John Duke of Lauderdale, &c. for his dreadful blaſphemy, eſpecially that word to the prelate of St Andrews, Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footſtool; his atheiſtical drolling on the ſcriptures of God, ſcoffing at religion and religious perſons; his apoſtacy from the covenant and reformation, and his perſecuting thereof, after he had been a profeſſor, pleader, and preſſer thereof; for his perjury in the buſineſs of Mr James Mitchel—for his adulteries and uncleanneſs; for his counſelling and aſſiſting the king in all his tyrannies, overturning and plotting againſt the true religion; for his gaming on the Lord's day, and for his uſual and ordinary curſing.

In the ſame manner he pronounced ſentence againſt the duke of Rothes, Sir George MacKenzie the king's advocate, and Thomas Dalziel of Binns.

After he had pronounced ſentence as above, he went on as follows, 'I think none that acknowlege the word of God, the power deputed to the church, and the reaſon and nature of that power, can judge this ſentence to be unjuſt. The pretence of its being unformal, without warnings, admonitions, &c. is fully anſwered, in that thoſe men have placed themſelves above the admonitions of miniſters, have repelled all due warnings, and wickedly put to cruel deaths the ſervants and miniſters of Chriſt, who have, with freedom and boldneſs, adventured to give them warnings and admonitions, and ſhut up all acceſs from us that remain to do the like; and as for proof of the fact I have here charged upon them, it needeth none, the deeds being notour and known, and the moſt of them ſuch as themſelves do avow, and, to their ſhame, boaſt of. And, as the cauſes are juſt, and ſuch as for which the miniſters of Chriſt have in all ages proceeded to the like ſentence, ſo, it being now done by a miniſter of the goſpel, and in ſuch a manner as the preſent circumſtances of the church of Chriſt, with reſpect to the preſent cruel perſecution will admit, the ſentence likewiſe is undoubtedly juſt alſo: and there are no powers on earth, either of kings, princes, magiſtrates or miniſters of the goſpel, can, without the repentance of the perſons openly and legally appearing, reverſe theſe ſentences upon any ſuch account. And as God, who is the author of that power, is the more engaged to the ratifying of theſe ſentences; ſo all that acknowlege the word of God, and believe themſelves ſubject to his government, ought alſo to acknowlege them.'

'If any ſhall object, as we do hear they do, that theſe proceedings, though not unjuſt, are fooliſh and rigorous; we anſwer with that word of ſcripture, which we have much more reaſon to uſe than thoſe of whom it is recorded, Gen. xxxiv. 31. 'Should he deal with our ſiſter as with an harlot?' Should they deal with our God as with an idol? Should they deal with his people as with murderers and malefactors? And ſhall we not draw out God's ſword againſt God's enemies.'

It is not my province either to condemn or vindicate this action, which not only expoſed the ſufferers to the greater fury of their perſecutors, but alſo to the cenſures of their friends, nay, and expoſed the whole body of the preſbyterians to the ridicule and ſcorn of their enemies; though nothing is more certain, than that they were neither conſulted in it, nor approved of it. However, the following queries are ſubmitted to the reader. Had not the perſons againſt whom the ſentence was pronounced been guilty of all that was laid to their charge? Was not Mr Cargill an approved miniſter of the goſpel? Can it be ſaid that kings and princes are not ſubject to the cenſures of the church? It is plain the church of England approves of the excommunication of royal perſons if they deſerve it, as may be ſeen from their homilies, which are recommended by the 35 article. Thus, in that homily of the right uſe of the church, part 2d, it is ſaid, 'And, according to this example of our Saviour Chriſt, in the primitive church, which was moſt holy and godly, and in the which due diſcipline, with ſeverity, was uſed againſt the wicked, open offenders were not ſuffered once to enter into the houſe of the Lord, nor admitted to common prayer and the uſe of the holy ſacraments, with other true Chriſtians, until they had done open penance before the whole church. And this was practiſed not only upon mean perſons, but alſo upon the rich, noble and mighty perſons, yea, upon Theodoſius that puiſſant and mighty emperor, whom, for committing a grievous and wilful murder, St Ambroſe biſhop of Milan reproved ſharply, and did alſo excommunicate the ſaid emperor, and brought him to open penance. And they that were ſo juſtly excluded and baniſhed (as it were) from the houſe of the Lord, were taken (as they be indeed) for men divided and ſeparated from Chriſt's church, and in moſt dangerous eſtate, yea, as St Paul ſaith, Even given unto Satan, the devil, for a time; and their company was ſhunned and avoided by all godly men and women, until ſuch time as they, by repentance and public penance, were reconciled.' Here then is the excommunication of a puiſſant and mighty emperor, and his being brought to open penance, approved of by the church of England.

From this the reader muſt judge for himſelf, how ill it becomes the high-flyers to make the Torwood excommunication a matter of reproach to all preſbyterians, even upon the ſuppoſition that they had approved of it, and whether that action was ſo unprecedented as ſome would repreſent it. As for the formality and ſeaſonableneſs of it at that time, I muſt refer him to what Mr Cargill ſays himſelf, and to his own reflection.

Next Lord's day Mr Cargill preached at the Fallow-hill in the pariſh of Livingſtone, and, in the preface ſaid, 'I know I am and will be condemned by many for what I have done, in excommunicating thoſe wicked men; but condemn me who will, I know I am approven of God, and am perſuaded that what I have done on earth is ratified in heaven; for, if ever I knew the mind of God, and was clear in my call to any piece of my generation-work, it is in that; and I ſhall give you two ſigns whereby you may know I am in no deluſion. 1. If ſome of theſe men do not find that ſentence binding upon them as they go off the ſtage, and be not obliged to confeſs it from their terror, and to the affrightment of others. 2. If theſe men die the ordinary death of men, then God hath not ſpoken by me.' The firſt of theſe was verified in the duke of Rothes; and the ſecond in the remarkable exit of the moſt of thoſe who were excommunicated.

In the month of September, Mr Archibald Riddel, brother to the laird of Riddel, together with Turnbull of Know and the laird of Down, were apprehended by the laird of Graden, and ſent in priſoners to the jail of Jedburgh. The council ordered Meldrum to bring them into into Edinburgh, and recommended Graden to the lords of the treaſury for the reward offered by the council's proclamation for taking Mr Riddel.

On the firſt of October he was examined before a committee of the council, and owned, that, though he had not preached in private houſes, where there were people without doors, which, by the laws then in being, was conſtructed to be a field conventicle. He declined giving his oath upon this, ſince oaths were tender things; neither would he engage not to preach in the fields for the future, though he had refrained from that practice for ſome time paſt; for, ſaid he, 'I have not ſince the indemnity, judged myſelf under a neceſſity to preach out of a houſe; but I know not but he that has called me to preach this while bygone in houſes, may, before I go out of the world, call me to preach upon the tops of mountains, yea, upon the ſeas; and I dare not come under any engagements to diſobey any of his calls.' And when farther urged upon this point, he ſaid, 'Both conformed and indulged have preached in the fields without offence; as, when their churches have been ruinous, or otherways, they could not conveniently preach in the church, they have done it in the church yard.' To this the advocate ſaid, 'In ſuch caſes as theſe it is not conſtructed to be againſt law, Mr Riddel replied, 'but then, my lord, what ſhall I do with my engagement never to preach in the fields, to know whether it ſhall be conſtructed againſt law or not? your lordſhip will not allow me to explain or put a conſtruction upon my engagement myſelf.' Not being able to anſwer this, the advocate ſaid, That, if he was of Mr Riddel's principles, he would judge it his duty rather to go out of the nation, than diſturb the peace of the land by acting contrary to its laws.

I ſhall not trouble the reader any farther on this, than to obſerve, that Mr Riddel was none of the followers of Mr Cargill; nay, he expreſly owned the king's authority, and diſapproved of thoſe who were otherwiſe minded; he had never been in what they called rebellion: ſo that all they could lay to his charge was his preaching in houſes when people were without doors, and his refuſing to engage not to preach in the fields for the future; and yet, after this examination, he was ſent back to priſon. We ſhall meet with him afterwards.

Mean while, on the fifth of October, Mr J. Veitch, miniſter at Weſtruther, was ſummoned to appear for preaching without a licence, and, not appearing, was ordered to be denounced and put to the horn. The ſame day Francis Grier, who had been five months in priſon for lodging two of his friends who had been at Bothwell for one night, was ordered to be releaſed upon ſigning the bond. One William Punton, who had been in priſon for harbouring Mr Cargill, was releaſed upon giving a bond of 1000 l. to anſwer when called.

The time of the Engliſh parliament's ſitting now drew near, when another attempt was to be made againſt the duke of York. In order to prepare the way for this, the earl of Shaftbury, attended by 12 lords and gentlemen of note, went publicly to Weſtminſter hall, and, at the king's bench bar, by a bill in form, preſented the duke of York as a popiſh recuſant. This action ſo ſurpriſed the three principal miniſters, that, to ingratiate the king with the parliament, they adviſed him to ſend his royal highneſs into Scotland, believing it would not be in his power to ſupport him if he continued in England during the ſeſſion. The king, approving of their reaſons, obliged the duke to return to Scotland, after repeated aſſurances that he would never forſake him.

The king, however, ſays my author, gave another turn to this in his letter to the council at Edinburgh, dated October 23. acquainting them that he was to ſend down his brother for the better diſpatch of affairs among them; and the chancellor letting them know that he was to land at Kirkaldy, and be at the houſe of Leſly till the Abbay ſhould be fitted up for his reception, they ordered all the counſellors on the ſouth of Aberdeen to wait on his highneſs at his arrival, that there may be all manner of demonſtrations of joy.

Accordingly, on the 25th of October, the duke and ducheſs arrived in Kirkaldy road, and repaired to Leſly houſe, where they continued till the 29th, when they came to the Abbay of Holy-rood houſe. On Saturday the biſhop of Edinburgh, with the clergy in town, waited upon him, and expreſſed the general ſatisfaction of the orthodox clergy at his arrival. But where the orthodoxy was, in careſſing a popiſh prince retiring from the reſentments of an Engliſh proteſtant parliament, muſt be left with the proteſtant reader. But it is well known that the prelatical clergy in Scotland, for all their orthodoxy, were not only at this time, but have ever ſince been the abettors of popery. Who complimented this popiſh prince upon the birth of his ſpurious impoſtor the Pretender? The orthodox clergy. Who were the great enemies of the revolution in Scotland? The orthodox clergy. Who were the great oppoſers of the proteſtant ſucceſſion? The orthodox clergy. Who the great encouragers of rebellions ſince the proteſtant line happily took place? The irregular ſucceſſors of the ſame orthodox clergy, who almoſt, to a man, are attached to a popiſh Pretender to this very day. It is not worth while to take notice of the council's fulſom letter to the king on this occaſion, dated November the 2d, and ſigned by 27 counſellors and three or four proteſtant biſhops. Only the receiving and careſſing of the duke of York in Scotland, when a lot of brave patriots in England were exerting themſelves to the utmoſt to get him excluded from ſucceeding to the Engliſh throne, was juſtly condemned by the poor perſecuted ſufferers, who bore their teſtimony againſt it, as we ſhall have frequent opportunity to relate.

On this 2d of November, the earl of Moray's commiſſion to be ſole ſecretary of ſtate was read in council, Lauderdale having reſigned that office into his majeſty's hands, after he had poſſeſſed it 20 years. Biſhop Burnet, in deſcribing his character, ſays, 'That his great experience in affairs, his ready compliance with every thing that he thought would pleaſe the king, and his bold offering at the moſt deſperate counſels, gained him ſuch an intereſt in the king, that no attempt againſt him, nor complaint of him could ever ſhake it, till a decay of ſtrength and underſtanding forced him to let go his hold.'

From a proceſs between Meldrum and Philiphaugh, it appeared that many oppreſſions and wrong impriſonments had been committed by the former, inſomuch that, by a moderate computation, he had levied from the ſhire of Teviotdale 100,000 l.

On the 11th of November the council proceeded againſt the encouragers of prohibited books, ſuch as Naphtali, Jus regni apud Scotos in Engliſh, Jus Populi Vindicarum, Reformed Biſhop, Calderwood's Hiſtory. John Calderwood ſtationer was impriſoned for having ſome of theſe books in his ſhop. All ſtationers and booklellers were ordered to produce the liſts of what books they imported from abroad, in order to have the approbation of one of the officers of ſtate, or of the biſhop of Edinburgh.

About this time Mr James Skene, brother to the laird of Skene in Aberdeen ſhire, was apprehended as a hearer of Mr Cargill. This gentlemen had not been concerned either at Bothwell, Airſmoſs, or the Torwood excommunication, and nothing but his hearing Mr Cargill could be laid to his charge. The council met on the 13th of November, upon receiving notice that the general had ſent in ſome priſoners. Mr Skene, Archibald Stuart, and John Spreul apothecary in Glaſgow were examined before them.

Mr Spreul's trouble began ſoon after Pentland. In the year 1667, he was ſeized by a party at Paiſley, becauſe he would not diſcover where his father was; but, after many terrible threatenings of being ſhot to death, roaſted at a fire, and ſome ſhort confinement, he was diſmiſſed at that time. In the 1677 he and others were ſummoned before a court at Glaſgow, and, becauſe he abſconded, was intercommuned. Then he went abroad, and was in Ireland 1679, from whence he came to Scotland after the ſkirmiſh at Drumclog; and though he had occaſion to be in company with ſome of the weſt-country army, yet he did not join them. After Bothwell his wife and family were turned out of their houſe and ſhop, while he, after concealing himſelf for ſome time, went over to Holland. He came back this year, with a deſign to carry his family to Rotterdam; but on the 12th of November was taken out of his bed at Edinburgh by major John-ſton, and was carried to the guard at the Abbay, where Mr Skene and Archibald Stuart were priſoners. Next day he was examined before the council concerning his opinion of the death of the archbiſhop, and his acceſſion to Drumclog and Bothwell. As to the former, he ſaid, he was in Ireland at that time, and knew nothing of it but by hearſay; that for himſelf, he would not have done it, and did not approve of it, and deſired to be excuſed from going any farther; becauſe he ſcrupled to condemn what he could not approve, ſince there muſt be a righteous judgment of God where there was a ſinful hand of man, and he might admire and adore the one, while he trembled at the other. As to Drumclog, he declared he was then in Ireland, where he firſt receved the account of it; but did not think it rebellion, ſince he owned the freedom of preaching the goſpel, and heard that what they did was only in ſelf defence. He farther owned, That upon his return from Ireland, he had occaſion to go through part of the weſt-country army, but did not join them; and ſaid, That he would not call that riſing rebellion, ſince he thought it was a providential neceſſity put upon them for their own ſafety after Drumclog. He refuſed to ſubſcribe his confeſſion.

The council pretending that there was a plot carrying on by Mr Cargil, Mr MacWard, and others, for murdering the king, ſubverting the government, and that Mr Spreul and Robert Hamilton were acceſſory to it, made an act on the 13th of November, ordering them to be examined by torture as to theſe things, and impowered the earls of Argyll, Linlithgow, &c. as a committee to examine them. But the reader may be aſſured that there was nothing in this plot unleſs in their own imaginations: however, it was proper that they ſhould have ſomething to ſay. The duke of York was pleaſed to gratify his eyes with this delightful ſcene, and ſo be honoured Mr Spreul with his royal preſence. The poor gentleman told them he could ſay no more than he had ſaid before the council, &c. but there was no help for him. The hangman put his foot into the inſtrument called The boot, and at every queſtion, gave about five ſtrokes on the wedges. The queries were, Whether he knew any thing of a plot to blow up the Abbay and the duke of York? Who was in the plot? Where was Mr Cargil? To all which he declared his abſolute ignorance. When nothing could be diſcovered, they ordered the old boot to be brought, and made him undergo the torture a ſecond time. He ſtill adhered to what he formerly ſaid. Dalziel complained that the hangman did not ſtrike hard enough, and was therefore offered the mall by the executioner to do it himſelf. When the torture was over, he was carried to priſon on a ſoldier's back; but was refuſed the benefit of a ſurgeon, and the pleaſure of ſeeing his wife. However, he recovered, and I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak more of him afterwards.

What paſſed at the examination of Mr Skene is related in a letter from himſelf to his brother, recorded in the Cloud of Witneſſes. He declared he was not at Bothwell; but that he owned the Sanquhar declaration, and the teſtimony of Rutherglen, and diſowned the king's authority ſo far as it was againſt the covenants and intereſt of Chriſt. Archibald Stuart, John Spreul, of whom I have now ſpoke, and Marion Harvey a ſervant maid in Borroſtounneſs, were likeways before them.

On the 15th the commiſſioners reported that they had examined Archibald Stuart by torture. They were ordered to be farther examined, and advocates were, on the 18th, appointed to plead for Mr Skene, who was brought before the juſticiary on the 22d, and condemned to be hanged on the 24th, and his head to be afterwards ſevered from his body; but the laſt part of his ſentence was diſpenſed with, and he was reprieved till the firſt of December.

Mean while John Potter farmer in Uphall in Weſt-Lothian, and Archibald Stewart in Borrowſtounneſs (the latter was at Airſmoſs, but the former had not been in arms) were both before the juſticiary, and condemned to be hanged on the 1ſt of December, along with Mr Skene. Their teſtimonies are all in the cloud of Witneſſes.

Mr Skene, in his laſt teſtimony, after having laid his blood on his perſecutors, declared againſt receiving the duke of York, and againſt every thing that had been done againſt the covenants and the work of reformation, and concluded his teſtimony much in the ſame ſtrain with Mr Hugh MacKail.

Archibald Stuart was reported to have ſaid, that he would kill the king or any of his council; but in his laſt teſtimony he ſays, 'However I and that ſuffering remnant be miſtaken, in that they gave out in their declaration, That I ſaid I would kill the king or any of his council, it is an untruth and forged calumny, to reproach the ways of God, more like themſelves and their own principles, who have killed ſo many of the people of God, both in the fields and upon ſcaffolds and us among the reſt, to pleaſe the bloody tyrant Charles Stuart's brother,—and to make men believe that we have been contriving a plot to murder them, &c. On the ſcaffold he ſung Pſal. ii. and read Mal. iii. but when in prayer he began to ſay, 'O Lord, what wilt thou do with this generation? What wilt thou do with bloody Charles Stuart? Immediately the drums were beat.

John Potter's teſtimony is large and particular; but, when ſpeaking of the enemies of God, and the perſecutors of his people, he ſaid, among other things, 'I pray that the Lord would open your eyes, that you may ſee your ſin, turn from them, and live. I forgive all men the wrongs they have done or can do to me. But for the wrongs done to Chriſt in robbing him of his right over his church and people, I know vengeance belongs to God, and he will repay them; therefore I leave them under proceſs and while they repent. And now I begin to enjoy him who is inviſible, &c.'

While theſe acts of ſeverity were carrying on in Scotland, the parliament of England met on the 21ſt of October, and on the 26th lord Ruſſel moved, that they might, in the firſt place, take into conſideration how to ſuppreſs popery and prevent a popiſh ſucceſſor. He was ſeconded by Sir Henry Chapel brother to the earl of Eſſex. And after ſeveral warm debates, it was reſolved that a bill be brought in to diſable the duke of York to inherit the imperial crown of this realm, and, after a great deal of reaſoning pro and con, the excluſion bill paſſed the houſe with a great majority. William lord Ruſſel attended by the lord Cavendiſh, Sir Henry Chapel, and almoſt the whole houſe of commons, carried the bill to the houſe of lords, where it miſcarried by a ſuperiority of 63 againſt 30. Biſhop Burnet ſays, all the biſhops voted againſt it. Rapin ſays, That eleven of them voted againſt it, and three for it, who, according to my author, were the biſhops of Cheſter, Exeter and London. When the news of the rejecting of this Bill came to Edinburgh, the chancellor propoſed to make public rejoicings there, but the duke of York declined this for the preſent. Thus a brave attempt for ſupporting the proteſtant intereſt at was this time fruſtrated; but providence had another method for accompliſhing this great deſign.

On the 20th the Revd. Mr John Carſtairs, William Johnſton and Joſeph Brody merchants in Edinburgh, were brought before a committee on account of ſome papers found with Mr Skene. Mr Carſtairs owned the king's authority, and diſclaimed the principles of Mr Cargil; but, at the ſame time, proteſted againſt Paterſon biſhop of Edinburgh ſitting in civil judicatories, refuſed him his titles, and called him only Mr Paterſon, which the biſhop reſented, and promiſed to make a return if ever it lay in his power.

On the 22d a very long and ſevere proclamation was publiſhed againſt Mr Cargill and his followers, wherein the king's great care for preſerving the proteſtant religion, was mightily cried up, [witneſs his ſupporting his brother's ſucceſſion, &c.] the followers of Mr Cargill were accuſed of the heinous crimes of rebellion, treaſon, murder, aſſaſſination, and carrying on a plot for killing the king, the duke of York, the councellors, biſhops, &c. and the teſtimonies emitted by the ſufferers, together with the Torwood excommunication, were all aggravated to the laſt degree; and therefore all the ſubjects were required to treat the plotters, &c. as rebels, &c. to apprehend them &c. and for their encouragement a reward of 5000 merks was promiſed for apprehending Mr Cargil,

3000 merks for Mr Douglas, and 1000 merks for each of the reſt of the conſpirators, &c. The council ſent up a copy of this proclamation to court, and gave his majeſty an account of theſe things. That ſome had renounced an allegiance to king Charles is certain; but that any of their deſignations encourage and aſſert the lawfulneſs of murders, aſſaſſinations, and the like, is falſe; and it was equally falſe that any plot was carried on among them for killing the king, his brother, &c. When Mr Skene was examined before a committee of the council, and was aſked if he thought it duty to kill the king, he anſwered, That he had ſtated himſelf an enemy to God's intereſt, and there was war proclaimed againſt him. This no doubt will be improved by the managers. We ſhall find that Mr Skene was not alone in this matter. How far, all things conſidered, he is to be vindicated, I muſt leave with the reader. But though, in ſome things, theſe martyrs for Chriſt may not have expreſſed themſelves in ſuch happy expreſſions as could be wiſhed, yet the injuſtice, cruelty and tyranny of their perſecutors cannot fail to leave a blot on their memory while the world laſts. Beſides, it is certain, that all they intended by its being lawful to kill the king, &c. was in their own defence.

On the 8th of December Mr Riddel was examined a ſecond time before the committee, and acknowleged the king's authority, and condemned thoſe who did not, but refuſed to engage not to preach in the fields, as before. And when the juſtice-clerk ſaid, Will you ſay that you believe not to preach in the fields, as long as matters continue as they are? His anſwer was, Really my lord, I am afraid to ſay or do any thing that has the appearance of a ſtraiter hedge about the exerciſe of my miniſtry than Jeſus Chriſt has drawn before me. And when aſked his opinion about the biſhop's death, he ſaid, if private perſons were allowed to go out of their ſtation, to kill men at their pleaſure, no man could be ſure of his life. He was again ſent to priſon.

Next day the advocate was ordered to proſecute Geo. Johnſton, James Stuart, Geo. White and Will. Dick priſoners, for being at the Torwood meeting; but, becauſe Chriſtian Spence, Sarah Spence and Janet Smith were only poor and ignorant, they were ſet at liberty, and threatned with being ſcourged if ever they were found at Conventicles. About this time Geo. Piper of Aberdeen, having been a priſoner for ſuppoſed correſpondence with Mr Skene and Mr Cargill, was ſet at liberty, ſince no ſuch thing could be made appear.

On the 16th garriſons were appointed to be kept in the houſes of Kenmuir and Freugh, and in the caſtle of Dumfries; and on the 23d the council wrote to the ſecretary Murray to procure a pardon for Will. Gordon of Culvennan who had been in the rebellion.

On the 25th of December ſome of the ſtudents in the college of Edinburgh brought to the head of the Cowgate the effigy of the pope in his robes, with his keys, mitre and triple crown; and, when they had excommunicated him, they carried him about in a chair like that where in he is elected at Rome, to the foot of the Black friars wynd. The ſtudents, knowing the thing had taken air, gave out that they were to carry his holineſs in proceſſion to the Graſs-market, the place of the execution of criminals; whereupon the guards marched thither. Mean while the boys marched in proceſſion by the Black-friars wynd to the High ſtreet, three of them going before with lighted torches. Being come thither they condemned his holineſs to be burnt: accordingly the torchmen blew up the effigy with gun powder. notwithſtanding their being attacked by ſome ſoldiers commanded by Linlithgow and his ſon; whom they warned to beware whom he ſtruck, ſince he had relations among them.

Mr G. Ridpath, having been very active in proſecting this affair, was taken up the day before it was to be put in execution, and great ſearch was made for the effigy, but in vain. Next day ſeveral gentlemens ſons were called before the council, and particularly examined whether any preſbyterian gentlemen or miniſters did contrive, aſſiſt, or direct them; who all declared there was none. The chancellor treated them civilly; but the biſhops endeavoured to enſnare them with queſtions about their conformity. However, being unable to obtain any advantage, they were diſmiſſed for that day. Only Mr Ridpath, then entering on the ſtudy of philoſophy, was very ill uſed by Sir William Paterſon and the council's ſervants, ſome of whom beat him and tore his hair. And for this, and no other reaſon, he was baniſhed his native country.

About this time the ſame ſpirit was working at Glaſgow, though in a different manner; for the ſtudents there wore coloured ribbons to diſtinguiſh themſelves from papiſts, for which ſeveral of their leaders, and particularly the marquis of Annandale, then a ſtudent, were called before the maſters and the archbiſhop. Annandale defended himſelf and his fellow ſtudents with ſpirit and reſolution; and calling the archbiſhop only Sir, Mr Nicholſon his regent reproved him, ſaying, William, do you not underſtand whom you ſpeak to, he is a greater perſon than yourſelf. Annandale replied, I know the king has been pleaſed to make him a ſpiritual lord, but I know likeways that the piper of Arbroath's ſon and my father's ſon are not to be compared. This ſpirit that ſhewed itſelf in the ſtudents could not but chagrin his royal highneſs; and what the conſequences of it was ſhall be related in

CHAP. V.

Of the executions of Iſobel Aliſon, Marion Harvey, Mr Cargill, and others: of the followers of John Gib: the ſufferings of heritors, &c. and other things to the ſeſſion of parliament.

THE duke of York's being now in Scotland ſharpened the edge of the perſecution; ſo that no leſs than 20 were executed in the courſe of this year 1681. The ſufferers had, it is true, declared againſt the king's authority, for which many of them were hanged, and otherwiſe perſecuted by their enemies, and cenſured by their friends. They branded them as madmen, enemies to government and civil ſociety; but it is very plain that they never oppoſed government or monarchy as ſuch, but only wicked, perjured and perſecuting governors. Theſe they did oppoſe, and that for the very ſame reaſons that brought about the revolution and the proteſtant ſucceſſion. I cannot expreſs this better than in the words of the author of the memoirs of the Church of Scotland, when ſpeaking of the Torwood excommunication, Says he, 'I deſire the impartial reader to compare it with the memorials above mentioned, [to wit, the memorial to the prince of Orange from the people of Great Britain, to invite him to come to their aſſiſtance] and ſee if it be poſſible for any Britiſh proteſtant, who owns the juſtice of the revolution, to reflect upon the zeal of theſe people, without bluſhing for himſelf and the whole nation, that they did not ſee and abhor the tyranny of thoſe reigns ſooner; and then they had joined with thoſe people inſtead of cenſuring their zeal; the revolution had then been brought about without foreign help at all; the prince of Orange had then been called over, as peaceably as king George, to take poſſeſſion of the crown; and the blood of near 20,000 people, who were one way or other murdered and deſtroyed by that now abdicated race of tyrants, had been ſaved. What a ſhame is it, ſays he, to us, and how much to the honour of theſe perſecuted people, that they could thus ſee the treachery and tyranny of thoſe reigns, when we ſaw it not; or rather, that they had ſo much honeſty of principle, and obeyed ſo ſtrictly the dictates of conſcience, as to bear their teſtimony early, nobly, and graciouſly to the truth of God and the rights of their country, both civil and religious, while we all, though ſeeing the ſame things yet betrayed the cauſe of liberty and religion by a ſinful ſilence and a dreadful cowardice.

But ſuppoſe, through the treatment, the unaccountable treatment they met with, they had gone a little beyond due bounds, and though ſometimes their expreſſions were not ſo well choſen, can that either condemn the principles of religion and liberty upon which they acted, nay, or their actual diſowning thoſe tyrants, who, for nothing but the matters of their God and Saviour, had declared them outlaws, rebels and traitors? Beſides, the blood of many was ſhed, againſt whom they could prove nothing but what they extorted from them by their ensnaring questions. Nay, even some of the weaker sex were hanged or drowned on this score. But I shall relate the matters of fact as they happened in the order of time.

It was a dreadful affront to the duke of York to find his Holiness treated in such a manner, on that grand festival the 25th of December; and therefore the sycophant managers must not overlook such an indignity. Accordingly, on the 4th of January, the masters of the college declare their abhorrence of what their scholars had done: and, on the 6th the council commanded the magistrates to order the college gates to be shut, and the classes to be dissolved. About this time several of the students were imprisoned, besides Mr Redpath, which so exasperated the rest, that, it is said, they threatened to burn the provost's house at Priestfield, because the magistrates, who were patrons of the college, instead of protecting them, had acted violently against them: and in a few days the house of Priestfield was burnt. Whereupon the council, on the 17th, issued a proclamation, offering 2000 merks, and a remission, to any who should discover the actors; but it does not appear that any discovery was made; nay, my author says, that some wanted not their jealousies that this house was burnt by others, with a view to bring an odium on people who were no ways concerned. The author of the pamphlet now before me, intitled, 'A brief and true account of the sufferings of the church of Scotland,' &c. printed at London 1690, says, That they, viz. the managers, first alledged that the students threatened to burn the provost's house, because he, like a blockhead, had suffered the king's soldiers to enter the city, contrary to his own oath and the town's privileges, to prevent the burning of the pope; and, when they had buzzed about this supposed threatening, they burnt it themselves, and charged the students with it, to make them odious, and find occasion of dissolving the university, which they did for some time; and though the said students offered to come to any legal trial for their vindication, it was never accepted, because the council knew it could be proved that some of the duke's livery were seen come from the house just as it took fire, and that a barrel of powder having the castle mark upon it, which it was not possible for any to come at but from the king's ammunition, was found in the park near the said house. Neither does it appear that ever any was brought to a trial for this.

The order of time leads me to the case of Isobel Alison and Marion Harvey, two young women, who were executed this month, to the perpetual disgrace of the bloody managers, who could have no acts of what they called rebellion, in the least, to lay to their charge. When they were taken I know not. Isobel Alison was apprehended at Perth, where she lived, only for speaking against the severity used to sundry good people there; for they could accuse her of nothing else. Marion Harvey was seized while going one day from Edinburgh to hear sermon in the fields, and was last year before the council. But though they had nothing against these two young women, they were resolved to shed their blood; and therefore upon what they owned at their examination they founded their indictment, and took away their lives. That the reader may have a specimen of the injustice of this period, that afterwards became common, I shall here insert the substance of their examination, first before the council, the next before the lords of justiciary.

When Isobel Alison was before the council, she was interrogated as follows: Question. Where did you live? at St Johnstoun? Answer. Yes. Q. What was your occupation? No answer. Q. by the bishop of Edinburgh, Have you conversed with Mr Donald Cargill? A. Sir, you seem to be a man whom I have no clearness to speak to. She said to another, who asked the same question, I have seen him, and I wish I had seen him sooner. Q. Do you own what he has done against the civil magistrate? A. I do own it. Q. Can you read the Bible? A. Yes. Q. Do you know the duty we owe to the civil magistrate? A. When the magistrate carrieth the sword for God, according to what the scripture calls for, we owe him all due reverence; but when they overturn the work of God, and set themselves in opposition to him, it is the duty of his servants to execute his laws and ordinances on them. Q. Do you own the Sanquhar declaration? A. I do own it. Q. Do you own the papers taken at the Queensferry on Henry Hall? A. You need not question that. Q. Have you conversed with rebels? A. I never conversed with rebels. Q. Did you know Mr Skene? A. I never saw him. Q. Did you converse with David Hackstoun? A. I did converse with him, and I bless the Lord that ever I saw him; for I never saw ought in him but a godly pious youth. Q. Was the killing of the bishop of St Andrews a pious act? A. I never heard him say that he killed him; but if God moved any to execute his righteous judgments upon him, I have nothing to say to that. After some other questions, they asked, Did you know the two Hendersons that murdered the lord St. Andrews? A. I never knew any lord St Andrews. Q. Mr James Sharp, if you call him so? A. I never thought it murder; but, if God moved and stirred them up to execute his righteous judgment upon him, I have nothing to say to that. Q. Will you own all you have said; for you will be put to own it in the Grass-market? We blame you in putting your life in hazard in such a quarrel. A. I think my life little enough in the quarrel of owning my Lord and Master's sweet truths; for he hath freed me from everlasting wrath, and redeemed my soul; and as for my body, it is at his disposal. There were some other questions, but, as they were much to the same purpose as those above, I omit them.

Marion Harvey's examination before the council was upon the same points with that of her fellow sufferer, and therefore I must refer the reader for the particulars to the Cloud of Witnesses: only, among other things, they said, Will you cast away yourself so? to which she replied, I love my life as well as any of you, but would not redeem it upon sinful terms. They said, the rock, the cod, and bobbins were as fit for her to meddle with as these things. They offered her the assistance of ministers, but she would have none of their providing.

On the 17th of January they were brought before the lords of justiciary; for it was the constant practice at this time, the one day to bring such as fell into their hands before the council, and there, by ensnaring questions, to bring them into a confession of such things as they accounted treason, and next day to prosecute them before the criminal court. These two women were accused for having at field conventicles, harbouring of Messr. Cargill, Cameron, &c. owning the Rutherglen and Sanquhar declarations, &c.

When Isobel Alison was before them, she was examined as follows: Q. Do you abide by what you said the last day? A. I am not to deny any thing of it. She owned she had conversed with David Hackstoun, and disowned their authority. Q. Do you disown us, and the king's authority in us? A. I disown you all because you carry the sword against God, and not for him, and have these nineteen or twenty years, made it your work to dethrone him, by swearing, year after year, against him and his work, and assuming that power to a human creature which is due to him alone, and have rent the members from their Head Christ.—Q. When saw ye the two Hendersons and John Balfour? seeing you love ingenuity, will you be ingenuous, and tell us, did you see them since the death of the bishop? A. They appeared publicly within the land since. Q. Did you converse with them within these twelve months? She was silent; but upon being urged to say either yes or no, she answered, Yes. Then they said, Your blood be on your own head, we shall be free of it. She answered, So said Pilate; but it is a question if it was so; and ye have nothing to say against me, but for owning of Christ's truths, and his persecuted members. They made no reply, but desired her to subscribe what she had owned, and, upon her refusing, did it for her.

Marion Harvey, before the justiciary, owned the Sanquhar declaration, &c. and then protested that they had nothing to say against her as to matter of fact; but only that she owned Christ and his truth, his persecuted people and members; of which she said, Ye have hanged some, others you have beheaded and quartered quick. To this they said nothing; but called those who were to sit on the jury, jury, who appeared with reluctance. One of them ſaid, He did not deſire to be engaged in this matter; but he was obliged: then he deſired that the confeſſions of the two priſoners might be read, becauſe he knew not what they had to ſay againſt them. When he was ordered to hold up his hand and ſwear, he fell a trembling. The jury being fixed, the confeſſions were read, and the advocate, in a ſpeech, aggravated every particular, in order to prove them guilty of treaſon. Some of the jury urged that there was no fact proved againſt them. The advocate ſaid, But treaſon is fact; and taking himſelf again, he ſaid, It is true, it is only treaſon in their judgment, but go on according to your law; and if you will not do it, I will proceed. The jury brought them in guilty on their own confeſſion; however, the paſſing of the ſentence was deferred till the 21ſt, when they were both condemned to be hanged at the Graſs market on the 26th.

Mean while, on the 20th, the council enlarged the powers of the laird of Meldrum for apprehending thoſe who were in the rebellion. The many ſearches which were made in conſequence of this were moſt oppreſſive. The ſame day the magiſtrates of Edinburgh were ordered to call all the maſters of coffee houſes before them, and oblige them to come under a bond of 5000 merks, to ſuffer no news-papers to be read in their houſes, but ſuch as are approved of by the officers of ſtate.

Next day all the ſtudents in the college of Edinburgh were ordered to retire 15 miles from that place, within 24 hours, and not to come within theſe bounds without leave from the council, under the pain of being treated as ſeditious perſons. A fine proteſtant government, to make ſuch a ſplutter about burning the pope! but it was decent to compliment his royal highneſs the duke.

On the 26th Iſobel Aliſon and Marion Harvey were executed according to their ſentence. The reader will find what paſſed between them and Mr Riddel in the Cloud of Witneſſes, together with their reſpective teſtimonies. When they were brought from the priſon to the council houſe, in order to be carried from thence to the place of execution, Marion Harvey ſaid, with a ſurprizing cheerfulneſs and heavenly tranſport, 'Behold, I hear my beloved ſaying unto me, Ariſe, my love, my fair one, and come away.' When in the council-houſe, Paterſon biſhop of Edinburgh (ſuch was the ſpirit of the man!) ſaid, Marion, you ſaid, you never would hear a curate, now you ſhall be forced to hear one; and immediately ordered one of his ſuffragans, whom he had prepared for the purpoſe, to pray. When he began, ſhe ſaid to her fellow priſoner, Come, Iſobel, let us ſing the 23d Pſalm; which they did, and thereby drowned the curate's voice, and confounded their perſecutors.

Their behaviour on the ſcaffold is not to be omitted. Iſobel ſung the 84th Pſalm, and read Mark xvi. cried over the ſcaffold, and ſaid, 'Rejoice in the Lord, ye righteous; and again, I ſay, rejoice. She was not ſuffered to pray till ſhe came to the foot of the ladder. As ſhe went up, ſhe cried out, 'O be zealous, ſirs, be zealous, be zealous! O love the Lord, all ye his ſervants! O love him; for in his favour is life!' And added, 'O ye his enemies, what will ye do? Whither will you fly in that day? for now there is a dreadful day coming on all the enemies of Jeſus Chriſt. Come out from among them, all ye that are the Lord's people.' Then ſhe concluded, 'Farewel all created comforts; farewel ſweet Bible in which I delighted moſt, and which has been ſweet to me ſince I came to priſon; farewel Chriſtian acquaintances. Now into thy hands I commit my ſpirit, Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt.' Then the executioner threw her over.

Marion Harvey likewiſe ſung Pſal. lxxxiv and having read Mal. iii. ſhe ſaid, 'I am come here to day for avowing Chriſt to be the Head of his church and King in Zion. O ſeek him, ſirs, ſeek him, and ye ſhall find him: I ſought him, and I found him; I held him, and would not let him go.' Then ſhe rehearſed briefly the heads of her written teſtimony. Going up the ladder, ſhe ſaid, 'O my fair One, my lovely One, come away.' And ſitting down on the ladder, ſhe ſaid, 'I am not come here for murder; for they have no matter of fact to charge me with; but only my judgment. I am about 20 years of age; at 14 or 15 I was a hearer of the curates and indulged; and while I was a hearer of theſe I was a blaſphemer and Sabbath-breaker, and a chapter of the Bible was a burden to me; but ſince I heard this perſecuted goſpel, I durſt not blaſpheme nor break the Sabbath, and the Bible became my delight.' Upon this the commanding officer called to the executioner to throw her over, which he did accordingly.

On the 31ſt of January, Thomas Turnbull of Standhill, and Walter Turnbull of Bewly, were forfeited in abſence by the juſtice-court, for being in arms at Bothwell. Next day the council made an act ordering all the ſtudents to take the oath of allegiance, and prohibiting the maſters to receive any, except on theſe terms. But the duke of York having moved in council, a few days thereafter, that conſidering the youth of many of the ſtudents, the tendering of the oath might be delayed till they came to the fourth claſs, this was complied with. His royal higneſs, to render himſelf the more popular, made a progreſs, this month, to Linlithgow and Stirling.

On the 16th the proceſs of forfeiture againſt Alexander Hamilton of Kinkell was dropt, for his eſtate was ſo reduced that it was not worth ſeeking after.

On the ſecond of March John Spreul apothecary in Glaſgow was indicted before the juſticiary for treaſon and rebellion; but the matter was put off till June. The ſame day John Murray in Borrowſtounneſs, and Chriſtopher Miller weaver in Gargunnock, were indicted in common form. Their confeſſions, which they made at their examination, were much the ſame with thoſe of others. Both were brought in guilty, and ordered to be hanged in the Graſs-market on the 11th inſtant. On the 8th of March, William Gowgar in Borrowſtounneſs, and Robert Sangſter a Stirling-ſhire man, received the ſame ſentence upon the like confeſſion. John Murray was, by the council, recommended to the king's clemency, as being rather miſled than malicious. The other three were executed time and place foreſaid. Their joint teſtimony, which is in the Cloud of Witneſſes, is directed, by way of addreſs, to the ſhire of Stirling. The compilers of that collection have omitted their particular teſtimonies, becauſe they ſuppoſed them vitiated by John Gib, or ſome who were tainted with his errors, of which we ſhall give account. Nay, they tell us, that Chriſtopher Miller and Robert Sangſter were ſuſpected to be in ſome danger from theſe errors. It is remarkable, that William Gowgar having had a little paper in his Bible, which he deſigned to throw over the ſcaffold; but, when taken to the council-houſe with his fellow-ſufferers, it ſome way or other fell into the hands of the perſecutors, who, having read it, commanded the executioner to tie him harder than ordinary, ſo that he could ſcarce go up the ladder; and afterwards they would not permit him to pray. When he began to ſpeak on the ladder, and ſay, I am come here for owning Chriſt to be Head and King in Zion, the drums were immediately beat. Then they pretended that they would offer him his life on condition he would own the king; but he replied, I will own none but Chriſt to be king in Zion. Then they ſaid, Will you not retract any thing, Sir? he anſwered, No, no; I own all, I adhere to all. Upon which they immediately called to the executioner to throw him over, which he preſently did, not ſuffering him to recommend his ſpirit to God.

On the 19th of March Thomas Kennoway, an officer in the guards, came with a party to the pariſh of Livingſtone in Weſt-Lothian, with pretended orders to apprehend all who had been at Bothwel. After he had got all the informations he could, he ſent two parties, with liſts of thoſe whom they were to apprehend, late on Saturday night. He ſpent the Lord's day in drinking and carouſing, and threatened to oblige the priſoners he had taken to defray the charges. On Monday he held a court, and forced the country people to come and ſwear as to their receiving or converſing with thoſe whom they called rebels; which ſhews the hardſhips the country people were made to ſuffer.

The ſouthern ſhires were at this time dreadfully oppreſſed with theſe military courts. Soldiers were ſent through pariſhes to act as they pleaſed, and their officers appointed courts in ſuch places as they had a-mind. Thus cornet Graham held a court in Dalry, about the beginning of this year, to which all men and women above 16 years of age were ſummoned, to declare upon oath, and ſometimes under very odd and ſtrange imprecations, whether they had been ever at field meetings, or countenanced any who frequented them. &c. They obliged them likewiſe to ſwear, with the ſame dreadful imprecations, what they knew of their neighbours or others in the pariſh. Courts of the ſame nature were held by that wretch Grierſon of Lagg, at Dumfries and Kirkcudbright. It is eaſy for the reader to make proper obſervations on theſe proceedings ſo inconſiſtent with legal government.

Many heritors at this time ſuffered much. For, on the the 18th and 21ſt of March, great numbers were before the juſticiary, particularly John Williamſon ſon to Joſeph Williamſon in Holl. J. Spreul younger writer in Glaſgow, James Walker younger of Hacketburn, William Tweeddale late bailie of Lanerk, and Hugh Weir merchant there, were, in order to have the benefit of the indemnity, obliged to reſign all lands and heritages to which they had a right before the ſaid act of grace, and then were diſmiſſed; but the far greater number, who were charged as guilty of the rebellion at Bothwell, were proſecuted in abſence, forfeited in common form, and ordered to be executed whenever apprehended. Their names are theſe: Dav. White, Gideon Weir, David Gibſon, John Wilſon, Mr Thomas Pilans, James Lawrie, Archibald Simpſon, Tho. Lauchlan, William Fergnſon, John Semple, Tho. Inglis, Alex. Anderſon, John Pumphray, Rob Goodwine, Ja. Cuningham, Iſaac Blackwell ſon to Tho. Blackwell, all in Glaſgow; John Jack in Narupiair, William Padzean in Lanerk, Robert Lockhart of Birkhill, James Weir of Johnſhilp, John Steil in Over-water-head, John Haddow and James White in Douglas, William Falconer, and A. Tacket in Hamilton, Gavin Wotherſpoon of Heathrie know, John Eaſtoun of Quarryneen, William Riddel in Rutherglen, Robert Fleming in Auchinſin, John Hamiltoun of Rogertoun, Thomas Craig in Jacktoun, John Millar in Longcalderwood, John Wilſon of Highſleet, Robert Steven of Newland, John Steil of Windhill, John Cochran of Craigie, James Dikes of Halburn, John Carduff in Jacktoun, Thomas Paton at Cambuſnethan, John Whytlaw and John Paterſon at Bothwellſhiel, John White of Newk, Thomas Lin of Blairachin, John Waddel of Clidſdale, John Clyde in Kilbride, all in the ſhire of Lanerk. The moſt that was proved againſt theſe perſons was converſe with ſome who had been concerned in the riſing, which was not poſſible for them to avoid.

In this month of March James Gray of Chryſtoun was brought before the juſticiary for alledged acceſſion to Bothwell, and acquitted. This gentleman had ſuſtained prodigious loſſes, and endured many hardſhips during ſome preceeding years. And though he was now acquited, yet his troubles were not at an end; for his known averſion to prelacy laid him open to the inſatiable reſentments of the orthodox clergy, at whoſe inſtigation his houſe was pillaged by the ſoldiers. Their rudeneſs was ſuch, that his family was forced to quit the houſe, except his wife who ſtayed in one of the rooms with a young girl that attended her. Mean while captain Strachan's men continued three months about the houſe, conſuming his ſubſtance; and in the beginning of next year he was ſeized, as we ſhall relate in its proper place.

On the 3d of April a paper was affixed to the church of Kettle diſowning the king's authority; but as it contained ſeveral things diſagreeable to the ſentiments of the followers of Mr Cargill; I ſhall ſay no more of it.

On the 5th there was a proceſs againſt ſuch of the heritors of Ayr ſhire who were alledged to have been concerned at Bothwell, and theſe following were forfeited in life and fortune, viz. Gilbert Macllwraith of Dunmorchie, Thomas MacJarrow of Bar, John MacJarrow of Penjarrow, Henry MacJarrow of Authalbanie, George MacLur of Benham, Hugh Macllwraith of Auchinſlour, John Alexander of Drummochrian, —— MacMichan of Killentian, Allan Bowy of Drumbog. The ſame day the court dropt the proceſs againſt Robert Fullerton of Bennels, Robert Nilbet of Greenholm, — Kennedy younger of Glenour, and James Aird younger of Miltoun, who appeared at the bar, and offered to ſtand trial; for, it is to be obſerved, that, in both theſe proceſſes, ſentence was pronounced only againſt abſents, for few of the heritors that appeared to ſtand trial were found guilty; and it was eaſy to find thoſe guilty who were not preſent to anſwer for themſelves, which was generally the caſe.

Mr Aird, whoſe ſufferings before this time were not ſmall, notwithſtanding his being ſet at liberty, was not exempted from farther hardſhips, for he was obliged to agree with the laird of Broich, who got a gift of his moveable effects, and to give him 1000 merks. His charges before the juſticiary amounted to 300 merks. A few weeks after this parties were ſent in queſt of him, ſo that he was obliged to ly for the ſpace of 42 nights in the open fields, and for ſeveral years to keep out of the way. Many times his houſe was rifled by the ſoldiers. However, he ſurvived his troubles, and enjoyed his religious liberty and property for many years after the revolution.

On the 6th the council ſuffered Mr Riddel to go and ſee his dying mother, upon condition of returning to his confinement by the 25th; but, being afterwards charged with breaking his confinement, keeping conventicles, and baptizing children, he was ordered to the Baſs, where he continued for three years.

The ſame day the Rev. Mr J. Blackadder was apprehended by major Johnſton, and was brought in priſoner before a committee of the council, conſiſting of the chancellor, the general, the advocate, and biſhop Paterſon, where he owned he was a Preſbyterian miniſter, and had been ordained to Traquair 1653. He was examined upon ſeveral things; ſome of which were theſe: Chan. Did you excommunicate the king, or was you at Torwood? A. I was not at Torwood theſe four years. Ch. But do you approve of what was done there? A. I am not free to declare my inward ſentiments and opinions of things and perſons, and therefore I humbly beg to be excuſed; you may form a libel againſt me, and I ſhall endeavour to anſwer it as I can. When he continued to decline giving an anſwer, the chancellor ſaid, But do you approve of ſhedding the king's blood, and damning him in ſoul and body? A. I do not, and no good man will. Ch. You have done yourſelf a favour in ſaying ſo; but we hear you keep conventicles ſince the indemnity. A. My lord, I am a miniſter of the goſpel, though unworthy, and under the ſtricteſt obligations to exerciſe my miniſtry, as I ſhall be anſwerable at the great day. I did, and do ſtill count it my duty to exerciſe my miniſtry, as I am called thereunto Ch. But you have preached in the fields, that is to ſay, on muirs and hill ſides. I ſhall not aſk you if you have preached in houſes, though there is no liberty even for that. A. I place no caſe of conſcience, nor make any difference between preaching in houſes and the fields, but as it may beſt ſerve the conveniency of the hearers; nor know I any reſtriction as to either in the word. My commiſſion reaches to houſes and fields, within and without doors. Ch. No doubt you know, and have ſeen the laws diſcharging ſuch preaching. A. My lord, I have, and am ſorry that ever any laws were made againſt preaching the goſpel. Ch. Not againſt the goſpel, but ſedition and rebellion. A. I preach no ſedition and rebellion. The advocate came to him, and ſaid, he was ſorry he was on the reſerve as to the excommunication. He anſwered, he was noways ſtraitened as to that, but he thought he was only obliged to ſpeak of facts relating to himſelf. The council ſat in the afternoon, and ordered him to be ſent to the Baſs, where he continued till the day of his death, which was about five years thereafter, when he entered into the joy of his Lord. I ſhall only obſerve concerning this eminent perſon, that the laſt time he preached in public, he lectured upon Micah iv. from ver. 9. where, among many other things, he ſaid, 'That the nearer our deliverance, our pains and ſhowers would come thicker and ſorer upon us; and that we had been in the furnace, but, ere we were delivered we ſhould go down to Babylon; that either Popery would overſpread this land, or would be at the breaking in upon us, like an inundation of waters.'

On the 8th of April a new and ſevere proclamation was iſſued againſt conventicles, though the faithful Mr Cargill was the only perſon who now ventured to preach in the fields; and in a very little that light was put out, as we ſhall relate.

About

About this time the blaſphemies of John Gib, a ſailor at Borrowſtounneſs, made a great noiſe; for what can be expected from bearing down the goſpel but the breaking in of a flood of errors? And I cannot but agree with my author, that it is ſurpriſing more were not led aſide into groſs deluſions in ſuch a period as this; for it is plain that it was but a remnant that ſtood firm, when the moſt part, through weakneſs, made too great compliances. However, Gib had but few that were drawn aſide by him, viz. David Jamie, Walter Ker, and John Young, together with 26 women. Theſe diſowned communion with all who were not of their way, belched out curſes and execrations upon them, and kept themſelves in deſert places from all company. They were called the ſweet ſingers, from their being much engaged in ſinging the mournful Pſalms, as Pſalm lxxiv, lxxix, lxxx, lxxxiii, cxxxii. In the beginning of this month they unanimouſly left their houſes, and retired to deſert places, to be ſafe from the land's utter ruin and deſolation. It would be to little purpoſe to give an account of all their extravagancies. They renounced the pſalms in metre, the tranſlation of the Old and New Teſtaments, becauſe of its dedication to king James. They rejected all authority throughout the world, from the tyrant Charles Stuart (I uſe their own words) to the ſmalleſt tyrant. They condemned the names of the months and of the days of the week. But, about the latter end of April, the Gibbites were all taken by a troop of dragoons, at the Wolhill crags, between Lothian and Tweeddale, and brought to Edinburgh. The four men were put into the Canongate priſon, and the women in the correction houſe; and, it is ſaid, ſome of them were ſcourged. It appears, from the paper they gave in to the council on the firſt of May this year, that they burnt the Pſalms in metre, &c. Before they were impriſoned Mr Cargill was at no ſmall pains to reclaim them. In ſhort, Mr Cargill's followers threw them out of their ſociety, and none of the other preſbyterians ever owned them. However, the duke of York and his party were ſecretly pleaſed with theſe extravagancies. They were ſoon releaſed. Some time after the four men, with Iſobel Bonn and another woman, went to a place called the Fryſk Moſs, where they burnt the Bible, every one of them uſing expreſſions, at the committing of that horrid act, which I ſhall not inſert. Theſe mad deluſions were prevented from ſpreading, and ſeveral of themſelves were afterwards reclaimed. James Gray of Chryſtoun, James Moſs and James Baird, were very uſeful in putting a ſtop to theſe deluſions.

On the 4th of May all chapmen were forbid to travel without a paſs from the ſheriff; and all ſchool-maſters in the pariſhes of indulged miniſters were ordered to be removed, unleſs they had a licence from the biſhop, leſt the minds of the youth ſhould be corrupted. The ſame day one Mr Alexander Symers, having ſeen the errors of prelacy and forſaken it, was ordered to be proſecuted; but there is no more concerning him.

About this time James Pettigrew, Alexander Smith, and Robert Ruſſel, all in the pariſh of Cambuſnethan, were ſeized and carried into Edinburgh. James Pettigrew continued three months a priſoner, and paid 300 merks. He ſuffered conſiderable loſſes during the following years. Alexander Smith eſcaped in womens clothes, but was afterwards taken and reſcued. He made his eſcape a third time from Dunnoter, but was retaken 1687, and continued priſoner till the revolution. Though theſe two were alledged to be concerned in Bothwell, yet nothing could be laid to the charge of the third, who was met on the road by a party of ſoldiers, and, refuſing to anſwer their queſtions, or pray for the king at their deſire, was firſt threatened with immediate death; but that practice not being as yet common, they ſent him in priſoner to Edinburgh, where he lay near two years in irons.

On the 2d of June Mr J. Wardlaw was denounced, and Lauderdale was continued in the command of the caſtle of Edinburgh. On the 8th a proclamation was iſſued for the parliament to ſit on the 28th of next month. It was now nine years ſince there was any parliaments in Scotland; and, though the king had no reaſon to be diſpleaſed with Scots parliaments, yet, duke Hamilton and others appearing in the laſt for the redreſs of grievances, it was ſoon diſſolved. But his majeſty's beloved brother was in Scotland, and, being appointed commiſſioner, all things were expected to go on ſmoothly.

The day after this proclamation new orders were given for garriſons in ſeveral houſes in the weſt country, particularly in the houſes of Sorn, the caſtle of Strathaven, and the houſe of Dean. Duke Hamilton and the earls of Loudon and Kilmarnock were ordered to get theſe houſes ready.

On the ſaid 10th of June R. Ferguſon of Letterpin was indicted for Bothwell; but it ſeems the matter was dropt.

The ſame day Mr Spreul was brought before the juſticiary, and was indicted for treaſon and rebellion, in correſponding and being preſent with the rebels at Bothwell, eſpecially with Mr John Welſh and Mr Samuel Arnot, who were called The bloody and ſacrilegious murderers of the late archbiſhop of St Andrews, though theſe two miniſters had no hand in that act. Sir George Lockhart, Mr Walter Pringle, Mr James Dacs, Mr Alexander Swinton, and Mr David Thoirs, were advocates for the priſoner.

At the beginning of the trial the advocate declared that he uſed the priſoner's confeſſion, when put to torture before the council, only as a mean of probation to adminiculate the other probation to be led, but doth not inſiſt upon that confeſſion at this time, either as a crime of itſelf, or a ſufficient mean of probation, without being adminiculate, as ſaid is. Mr Pringle for the priſoner alledged, that he could not come under a new trial, having been examined by the council for the ſame crime, and been tortured two ſeveral times, and having ſtill denied it; and conſequently, by the law of this and all other nations, he ought not to be arraigned and condemned for that crime upon any new evidence. This occaſioned a long debate, which I ſhall not trouble the reader with. He may ſee what was ſaid pro and con in my author, Vol. II. p. 166, &c.

After this debate was over, the lords, by their interlocutor, found the indictment relevant, or that the things ſpecified in it were treaſonable, and referred the proof to the jury; and rejected the defence founded on the torture, becauſe the council's commiſſion did not warrant the priſoner to be queſtioned on the crimes ſpecified in the indictment, and continued the action to the 13th, when Mr Pringle, for the priſoner, alledged, that, notwithſtanding the interlocutor, the defence ought to be ſuſtained, and took inſtruments upon producing the commiſſion; and Mr Thoirs added, that the committee were ſole judges of the pertinency of the interrogatories, and that the priſoner, having in torture denied the crimes laid to his charge, ought to be acquitted; and the jury acquitted Mr Spreul, for they found no crime proved againſt him. Nevertheleſs the council remanded him to priſon, alledging they had ſeveral other things againſt him, fined him in 500 l. ſterling for being at field meetings, and ſent him to the Baſs, where he continued for ſix years. William Lin writer in Edinburgh was fined in the like ſum, and ſent to the Baſs along with him. One reaſon of this ſeverity was, becauſe, when the duke of York aſked at Mr Spreul in March laſt, Sir, will you kill the king? he directed himſelf to the chancellor, and ſaid, my lord, I bleſs God I am no papiſt; I lothe and abhor all thoſe Jeſuitical and murdering principles; neither my parents, nor the miniſters I heard, ever taught me ſuch principles.

On the 15th Francis Borthwick, ſecond ſon to James Borthwick of Hartlaw, was declared to be an outlaw and fugitive, becauſe he had apoſtatized from Chriſtianity, embraced Judaiſm, and had been circumciſed, and blaſphemed the Lord Jeſus Chriſt. This my author thinks was the only inſtance of the kind ſince the reformation.

Next day Mr Alexander Haſtie and John Row were denounced for keeping conventicles. The ſame day a proclamation was iſſued for a faſt to be obſerved in the ſouth parts on the 29th, and in the more remote parts on the 6th of July. The cauſes of this faſt were the blaſphemous and ſanguinary opinions of many who had left the communion of the eſtabliſhed church, the threatened famine, and the approaching ſeſſion of parliament. I ſhall only here obſerve, that they had not acted like themſelves, if ſome virulent reproaches had not been thrown upon the ſuffering ſuffering people. The blood of many of God's people was upon them, and, had not their eyes been ſhut, that ſhould have been mentioned as one of the chief grounds of humiliation; but they had no knowlege of this.

On the 21ſt the earl of Queenſberry, ſheriff principal of Dumfries, or his deputes, were ordered to call ſeveral before them for conventicles, which brought not a few to trouble; and new orders were iſſued againſt thoſe who had been at Bothwell; the ſheriffs and other magiſtrates were appointed to ſeize and bring them to juſtice, and ſecure their rents and lands for his majeſty's uſe, and the country from field conventicles.

Adam Philip, Laurence Hay a weaver, and Andrew Pittilloch land labourer in the pariſh of Largo in Fife, having joined in a ſociety for prayer and conference, ſigned a paper laſt month, intitled, A teſtimony againſt the evils of the times. That paper, ſome way or other, having come into the hands of the managers, they were apprehended, and on the 11th of July, brought before the juſticiary. They owned the ſaid paper, in which they diſclaimed the king's authority, and were condemned to be hanged at the Graſs market on the 13th, which was done accordingly. My author ſays that this paper ſeemed, by the quotations from it in their proceſs, to be wild, and to ſmell of Gib's deluſions. As to that I can ſay nothing; only the teſtimonies of the two laſt, mentioned in the Cloud of Witneſſes, breathe a ſpirit of true piety; and Laurence Hay, in particular, leaves his teſtimony to the ſcriptures of the Old and New Teſtament, to the verſion of the Pſalms in metre, and to the work of reformation, covenants national and ſolemn league, &c. Andrew Pittilloch declared againſt the four men in the Canongate tolbooth, and all that joined with them, for wronging the ſcripture. Adam Philip is omitted in the Cloud of Witneſſes.

On the 12th William Thomſon ſervant in Froſk, who had been ſeized on the laſt Sabbath of June, as he was coming from hearing Mr Cargill, was examined before the committee for public affairs. He owned his being at Bothwell, and that he had not taken the bond, &c. He refuſed to anſwer whether the riſing at Bothwell was rebellion, and concerning the king's authority and the archbiſhop's death. Being aſked if it was lawful to kill the officers of the army, he aſked at the committee if it was lawful for them to kill the people of God, adding, that, if they pleaſed, they might lay the one to the other. Being farther aſked, if, to ſave his life, he would ſay, God ſave the king? he anſwered, That he would not buy his life at ſo dear a rate as to commit any ſin.

At this time the pious, faithful, and zealous Mr Daniel commonly called Donald Cargill was in his enemies hand. The laſt time he preached was in Dunſyre common, between Clydeſdale and Lothian, when he expounded Jer. i. and preached from Iſa. xxvi. 20, 21. Some time that night (for he durſt not leave the deſert place where he preached till it was dark) he went, by the perſuaſion of Mr Smith and Mr Boig, with the lady of St John's Kirk, as far as Covingtoun-mill, to the houſe of one Andrew Fiſher a mile from that lady's houſe. James Irvine of Bonſhaw, having obtained a general commiſſion, marched with a party of dragoons from Kilbride, and next morning, by ſun riſing, came to St John's Kirk, and, having narrowly ſearched that houſe and the houſe of one James Thomſon, came next to Covingtoun mill, and there apprehended him, together with Mr Smith and Mr Boig. Bonſhaw cried out, Oh bleſſed Bonſhaw, and bleſſed day that ever I was born, that have found ſuch a prize this morning! for a reward of 5000 merks was promiſed to the apprehender of Mr Cargill.

They marched hard to Lanerk, and put the priſoners in jail till the ſoldiers had ſome refreſhment. When they got horſes they brought them out in haſte and ſet them on their bare backs. Bonſhaw with his own hands tied Mr Cargill's feet below the horſes belly very hard. The good man looked down to him, and ſaid, 'Why do you ty me ſo hard? your wickedneſs is great, you will not long eſcape the juſt judgment of God, and, if I be not miſtaken, it will ſeize upon you in this place.' And this was verified; for, ſoon after he got the price of his blood, he was killed in a duel near Lanerk. His laſt words were, God damn my ſoul eternally, for I am gone.

Fearing a reſcue, they made all the diſpatch they could to Glaſgow. When near the city they turned him on the horſe and led him in backward, which drew tears from many to ſee their old miniſter in ſuch a poſture, for he had been ſome years miniſter of the Barony church. When they came to the tolbooth they halted till the magiſtrates came to receive them. Then that wretch John Niſbet, the archbiſhop's factor, ſaid, by way of ridicule, Mr Cargill, (three times over) will you not give us one word more? alluding to an expreſſion Mr Cargill ſometimes uſed in his ſerious pathetic way of preaching. The good man, looking on him with regret and concern, ſaid, Wicked poor man, why do you mock? ere you die you ſhall deſire one word, and ſhall not have it; and ſoon after he was ſtruck dumb, his tongue ſwelling in his mouth. Robert Goodwin and John Hodge, two Glaſgow men who were witneſſes of this, went to viſit him. Goodwin deſired him to write what kept him from ſpeaking. He wrote, That it was a juſt judgment from the Lord, and the ſayings of the miniſter verified upon him for his mocking of him; and, if he had the whole world, he would give it for the uſe of his tongue again. But he died in great torment and ſeeming terror.

From Glaſgow Mr Cargill and his fellow priſoners were carried to Edinburgh, and on the 15th of July he was examined before the council. The chancellor Rothes (being one of the ſeven whom he had excommunicated at Torwood) raged againſt him, and threatened him with extraordinary torture and violent death. Mr Cargill ſaid, my lord Rothes, forbear to threaten me, for, die what death I will, your eyes ſhall not ſee it; and it is well known his lordſhip died that morning that Mr Cargill and his fellow-martyrs ſuffered in the afternoon. When he was aſked if he owned the king's authority, and the king as his lawful prince, he anſwered, As the magiſtrate's authority is now eſtabliſhed by the act of parliament anent ſupremacy, and the explanatory act, that he denied the ſame, but refuſed to give any anſwer to the other branch of the queſtion. He likewiſe declined to anſwer as to the excommunication, that being an eccleſiaſtical matter, and the council being a civil judicatory. He owned the lawfulneſs of defenſive arms, in caſe of neceſſity, denying that thoſe who roſe at Bothwell, &c. were rebels, or that he was concerned in drawing up the Sanquhar declaration. He declined giving his judgment as to the principles contained in it, unleſs he had more time to peruſe the contents. He farther declared, that he could not give his ſenſe of the killing of the archbiſhop, but that the ſcripture ſays, The Lord giving a call to a private man to kill, he might do it lawfully, and gave the inſtances of Jael and Phinehas. Theſe were the moſt material things upon which he was examined.

On the ſaid 15th Mr James Boig, ſon to James Boig merchant in Edinburgh, and Mr Walter Smith, ſon to Walter Smith in the pariſh of St Ninians, ſtudents of divinity, were examined before the council. The former owned the principles of the ſufferers; that the riſing at Bothwell was lawful, being in defence of the truth. As to the killing of the archbiſhop, he declared he was not obliged to anſwer for the actions of others. He owned the Sanquhar declaration; but refuſed to ſign his confeſſion, becauſe he ſaid that would be an owning of the king's authority, which he diſowned. The letter declared he did not acknowlege the preſent authority the king is now inveſted with, and that the grounds of the excommunication were juſt. On the 19th Mr Smith was again before the council, and, the Sanquhar declaration being read, declared that he owned it with this explication, that he did not look on thoſe who compoſed it as the formal repreſentatives of the preſbyterian church, and that he did not like the word denuded in that expreſſion, 'the king ſhould have been denuded many years ago;' but that what the king had done juſtified the people in revolting from him. As to declaring war, he did not know if they were called, or in a capacity to declare war: and therefore he was of opinion that thereby they only intended to juſtify the killing of any of the king's forces in their own defence, when aſſaulted aſſaulted, otherwiſe it might have been eſteemed murder. As to the king's being called an uſurper and a tyrant, he ſaid, That he knew the king was an uſurper, and wiſhed he was not a tyrant.

One William Cuthil a ſailor in Borrowſtounneſs, having been taken by ſome of the earl of Mar's men was likewiſe examined, when he denied the king's authority, and declared that he deſerved to die; and that he thought the perſons who killed the archbiſhop had the glory of God before their eyes.

Mr Cargill was again before the council on the 19th of July, but refuſed to anſwer their queſtions, except as to the excommunication, when he expreſſed himſelf as above. It ſeems there was a motion made to ſpare his life, and ſend him to the Bass as a priſoner for life. When the vote was put, the motion was rejected, occaſioned by the caſting vote of the earl of Argyll, which afterwards lay heavy upon his lordſhip.

On the 26th Mr Cargill, Mr Smith, Mr Boig, W. Thomſon, and William Cuthil, were brought before the juſticiary, and being indicted in common form, their confeſſions were produced as evidences againſt them, and they were all brought in guilty of high treaſon, and condemned to be hanged at the croſs of Edinburgh next day, their heads to be ſevered from their bodies, and thoſe of Meſſ. Cargill, Boig and Smith, to be placed on the Nether-bow, and the heads of the other two on the Weſt-port. When Mr Cargill's confeſſion was read before the juſticiary, he declared before them, that the word act explanatory in his confeſſion is thus to be underſtood, 'That the act explaining the king's ſupremacy gives him a right to the authority of Jeſus Chriſt, and that ſupremacy, given him by act of parliament, is againſt right; and farther declared, that thoſe who roſe in arms at Bothwell were not rebels, but raiſed by oppreſſion.' On the 27th Mr Cargill and the other four were all executed according to their ſentence.

Mr Cargill's teſtimony is in the Cloud of Witneſſes, and in my author's appendix, of which the following is an abſtract: 'This is the moſt joyful day that ever I ſaw. —My joy is now begun, which I ſee ſhall never be interrupted. I ſee both my intereſt and his truth, the ſureneſs of the one and the preciouſneſs of the other. It is near thirty years ſince he made it ſure, and ſince that time (though there has fallen out much ſin,) yet I was never out of an aſſurance of mine intereſt, nor long out of ſight of his preſence.—It is long ſince I could have ventured on eternity through God's mercy and Chriſt's merit; but death remained ſomewhat terrible; but that is taken away, and now death is no more to me but to caſt myſelf into my huſband's arms, and to ly down with him.—I have been moſt in the main things, not that I thought the things concerning our times little, but that I thought none could do any thing to purpoſe in God's great and public matters, till they were right in their conditions. And O that all had taken this method, for then there had been fewer apoſtaſies!—My ſoul trembles to think how little of regeneration there is among the miniſters and profeſſors of Scotland! O the miniſters of Scotland, how have they betrayed Chriſt's intereſt and beguiled ſouls! —— They have ſold things of Chriſt, and liberties of his church, for a ſhort and curſed quiet to themſelves, which is now near an end.—As to our profeſſors, my counſel to them is, that they would ſee well to their own regeneration; for the moſt part of them has that yet to do.—As to the cauſe of my ſuffering, the main is not acknowleging the preſent authority, as it is eſtabliſhed in the ſupremacy and explanatory act. This is the magiſtracy that I have rejected, that was inveſted with Chriſt's power. And ſeeing that power taken from Chriſt, which is his glory, is made the eſſential of the crown, I thought this was as if I had ſeen one wearing my huſband's garments after he had killed him.'—

After he got to the ſcaffold, he ſtood with his back to the ladder, and deſired the attention of the numerous ſpectators; and after ſinging Pſal. cxviii. from ver. 16. he began to ſpeak to three ſorts of perſons; but, being interrupted by the drums, he ſaid, with a ſmiling countenance, Ye ſee we have not liberty to ſpeak, or to ſpeak what we would, but God knoweth our hearts. As he proceeded he was again interrupted as before. Then after a little ſilence, he began to exhort the people, and to ſhew his own comfort in laying down his life, and in the aſſurance of a bleſſed eternity. Thus he ſpoke, 'Now I am as ſure of my intereſt in Chriſt, and peace with God, as all within this Bible and the ſpirit of God can make me, —and I am fully perſuaded that this is his way for which I ſuffer, and that he will return glorioufly to Scotland; but it will be terrifying to many; therefore I intreat you be not diſcouraged at the way of Chriſt, and the cauſe for which I am to lay down my life and ſtep into eternity, where my ſoul ſhall be as full of him as it can deſire to be. And now this is the ſweeteſt and moſt glorious day that ever my eyes did ſee.—Enemies are now enraged againſt the way and people of God, but ere long they ſhall be enraged one againſt another to their own confuſion.' At this the drums beat a third time. When he ſet his foot on the ladder, he ſaid, 'The Lord knows I go up this ladder with leſs fear and perturbation of mind, than ever I entered the pulpit to preach.' And when he was up he ſat down and ſaid, 'Now I am near to the getting of my crown, which ſhall be ſure; for I bleſs the Lord, and deſire all of you to bleſs him, that he hath brought me here, and makes me triumph over devils, men and ſin, they ſhall wound me no more. I forgive all men the wrongs they have done to me, and pray the Lord may forgive all the wrongs that any of the elect have done againſt him. I pray that the ſufferers may be kept from ſin, and helped to know their duty.' Then having prayed a little within himſelf, he lifted up the napkin and ſaid, Farewel all relations and friends in Chriſt; farewel acquaintances and all earthly enjoyments; farewel reading and preaching, praying and believing, wanderings, reproaches and ſufferings. Welcome joy unſpeakable and full of glory. Welcome Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt. Into thy hands I commit my ſpirit.' Then he prayed a little and the executioner turned him over praying. Thus the Rev. and faithful Mr Donald Cargill finiſhed his courſe, and the miniſtry he received of the Lord.

Mr Walter Smith ſuffered with him. His teſtimony is alſo in the Cloud of Witneſſes, to which I muſt refer the reader. He adhered to the very ſame cauſe with Mr Cargill, and declared againſt the ſame uſurpation of Chriſt's crown and dignity, and died with aſſurance of his intereſt in Chriſt, declaring his abhorrence of Popery, Prelacy, Eraſtianiſm, and all the other ſteps of defection. He went up the ladder with all the ſigns of chearfulneſs; and, when the executioner was to unty his cravat, he would not ſuffer him, but untyed it himſelf, and, calling for his brother, threw it down, ſaying, This is the laſt token you ſhall get from me. After the napkin was drawn over his face he uncovered it again, and ſaid, 'I have one word more to ſay, and that is to all who have any love to God and his righteous cauſe, that they would ſet time apart, and ſing a ſong of praiſe to the Lord for what he has done to my ſoul; and my ſoul ſays, To him be praiſe.' Then the napkin being let down, he was turned over praying. Mr Smith ſtudied under the famous Leuſden, who had a ſingular value for him. He drew up a paper containing twenty two ſteps of defection; and, if theſe be conſidered, it will appear, that few or none of the ſufferers exceeded him in their teſtimonies againſt the encroachments, made at that day, upon the royal prerogatives of Chriſt as the head of his church.

Mr Boig was next diſpatched, and adhered to the ſame teſtimony, and died in the full aſſurance of faith. He concludes his letter to his brother in theſe words. 'Let this ſuffice, that I am once fairly on the way and within the view of Immanuel's land, and in hopes to be received an inhabitant there within the ſpace of 26 hours at moſt. Farewel all earthly comforts; farewel all worldly vanities; farewel all carnal deſires. Welcome croſs, welcome gallows, welcome Chriſt, welcome heaven and everlaſting happineſs, &c. I have no more ſpare time. Grace, mercy and peace be with you. Amen.

I do not find any thing recorded of the other two, viz. William Thomſon and William Cuthil, when at the place of execution; but it appears from their teſtimonies, which are in the Cloud of Witneſſes, that they continued to the laſt, zealous againſt the tyranny and defections of the times They had not the education of their three fellow ſufferers, and therefore, though they did not expreſs themſelves ſo accurately, that is to be excuſed.

Executions are uſually attended with a vaſt croud of ſpectators. Among others, who beheld this execution was Mr James Renwick, who was the laſt that fell a ſacrifice, in this period, to prelacy, and the bloody houſe of Stuart. Mr Renwick was an early convert; for, having finiſhed his academical ſtudies, he was ſo tender in conſcience, that he refuſed to take the oath of allegiance and ſupremacy; and therefore, with two others he took his degrees privately at Edinburgh, where he remained, proſecuting his ſtudies, attending on the then private and perſecuted meetings, and continuing in unity with the miniſters there, until he diſcovered their defections from many degrees of the covenanted reformation, in accepting of indulgences, eſpecially the banded indulgence after Bothwell. This brought him into great perplexity, neither knowing how to countenance them or to withdraw from them. But Mr Cargill's execution made ſuch an impreſſion upon him, that he was determined to embark with theſe faithful martyrs, to tread in their ſteps, and in his ſtation to defend their cauſe. Among other things he was grounded in this reſolution, 'When he obſerved, ſays the writer of his life, how the council and courts of inquiſition, by putting the queſtion of owning the authority of Charles the II. ſo generally and peremptorily to all priſoners, were purſuing a ſtrange and ſingular piece of policy, to involve all whom they were perſecuting in the guilt of their perſecution, by owning that authority which promoted it: therefore he and others examined the point, and ſoon found that Charles had forfeited all authority, by his perfidious breach of truſt, and overturning all the fundamental conſtitution of the government, both in church and ſtate, &c. And as the perſecuted people kept ſocieties for prayer and conference, Mr Renwick joined one of theſe for a time, but found it neceſſary to withdraw, becauſe they complied with the ceſs, and fought for a ſociety that was free of all theſe compliances. We ſhall hear more of him afterwards, I go on now to

CHAP. VI.

Of the Duke of York's parliament; the teſt: the trial, condemnation and eſcape of the earl of Argyll: the execution at the Gallow lee, and other things to the end of the year.

THE execution of Mr Cargill and his fellow ſufferers, the day before the ſitting of the parliament gave but a melancholy proſpect. Neither could any good be expected, when the duke of York, a profeſſed papiſt was commiſſioner.

The parliament ſat down on the 28th of July, when, after reading of the king's letter, the commiſſioner delivered a ſpeech, from which it appears that the chief deſigns of this parliament were to bear down ſeparation, i. e. thoſe who could not conform to the times, and ſecure the ſucceſſion, that is popery and tyranny. The firſt was tacitly recommended in the king's letter, and the other in the commiſſioner's ſpeech, though that, doubtleſs, might have come with a better grace from another.

The firſt act was for ſecuring the proteſtant religion. This came of courſe; for moſt parliaments ſince the reformation began with what they thought had a reference to the ſecurity of religion. Biſhop Burnet ſays, The duke thought it would give a good grace to all that ſhould be done afterwards, to begin with ſuch a general and cold confirmation of all former laws.

By the ſecond act, being act aſſerting the right of ſucceſſion to the imperial crown of Scotland, 'The eſtates of parliament, conſidering that the kings of this realm derive their royal power from God Almighty alone, do ſucceed lineally thereto, according to the known degrees of proximity of blood, which cannot be interrupted, ſuſpended, or diverted by any act or ſtatute whatſoever; [this act then ſeems quite unneceſſary] and that none can attempt to alter or divert it, without involving the ſubjects of this kingdom in perjury, and rebellion, and without expoſing them to all the fatal and dreadful conſequences of a civil war, do therefore, &c. I ſhall make no remarks here further, but obſerve, that, in about ſeven years thereafter, the whole iſland came to have no good will to this lineal ſucceſſion, and went into the meaſures attempted by ſome brave patriots in England, and put in practice the principles of liberty for which the ſufferers in Scotland took joyfully the ſpoiling of their goods, and laid down their very lives.

Having thus ſettled their lineal ſucceſſor, by their 3d act they offered a new ſupply to the king, becauſe of the danger the kingdom was in by ſeditious and rebellious field-conventicles, and to ſupport the army in beating them down. I ſhall not trouble the reader with their act for ſecuring the peace of the country; for, as it was prelacy that ever diſturbed the quiet of the kingdom, ſo it was impracticable to reſtore peace while that remained. Prelacy in Scotland, and the peace of the nation, have been always found inconſiſtent. By this act the fines for field conventicles were all doubled, and burgeſſes, beſides their former fines, were to loſe their burgeſſhip or freedom, and be baniſhed the town. But the act which made moſt noiſe was that which impoſed the oath called the teſt, of which I ſhall ſpeak a little more particularly, when I have mentioned ſome things that previouſly happened.

The day before this parliament ſat down, the duke of Rothes died. When he felt the pangs of death he called for ſome of his lady's miniſters; for it ſeems his own miniſters were good to live with, but not to die with. Accordingly he had the aſſiſtance of the Rev. Mr John Carſtairs and Mr George Johnſtoun, who dealt with great freedom and faithfulneſs, rehearſing many wicked acts of his life. He ſaid to Mr Carſtairs, we all thought little of what that man did in excommunicating us, but I find that ſentence binding upon me now, and will bind to eternity. When Mr Johnſtoun was praying, ſeveral noblemen and biſhops overhearing him in the next room, ſome of the former ſaid to the biſhops, He is a preſbyterian miniſter that is praying; the de'il ane of you can pray as they do, though your prayers would keep a ſoul out of hell. In ſhort, the noblemen were much affected, and duke Hamilton ſaid, We baniſh theſe men from us, and yet when dying we call for them; this is melancholy work!

Lauderdale being out of the ſecretary's office, and the duke of Rothes's death making great changes among the managers, the duke of York's party came in, many of whom complimented him with their religion, and turned papiſts. And no doubt the hopes of ſucceeding Rothes excited ſeveral to court the duke's favour; and by this means his royal highneſs got every thing carried in the parliament to his mind.

On the 3d of Auguſt a proceſs of error was commenced againſt ſeveral of the jury who had acquitted ſome of the heritors in the ſhire of Lanerk laſt March. All the jury got off except Alex. Gray and Ja. Bailie merchant in Edinburgh, and J. Gray of Wariſtoun, who were ſentenced to have forfeited all their chattels and other moveables to his majeſty's uſe, and to ly in priſon for a year.

While public buſineſs was going on in the parliament, one ſtood up and accuſed lord Halton, duke Lauderdale's brother, of perjury, on account of Mr Mitchel's affair. He had in his hands the two letters which that lord had written to the earl of Kincairdin, mentioning the promiſe of life that was made him; and as was told formerly, lord Halton ſwore, at his trial, that no ſuch promiſe was made. The lord Kincairdin was dead a year before this, but his lady had delivered up theſe letters to be made uſe of againſt lord Halton. Upon reading them the matter appeared plain. The duke was not ill pleaſed to have Lauderdale and his brother thus at mercy, yet he would not ſuffer the matter to be determined in a parliamentary way; ſo he moved that the whole affair might be referred to the king; which was immediately agreed to. Thus, ſays the hiſtorian, that infamous buſineſs was made public, and yet ſtifled at the ſame time; and no cenſure was ever put on that baſe action.

Another vile diſcovery was made. Lord Bargeny nephew to duke Hamilton, had been impriſoned on account of the riſing at Bothwell; the whole affair was laid before the parliament, and his lordſhip had full proof of every very thing ready to produce; but the duke prevailed to have this likeways refesred to the king, and it was never more heard of. 'This says Burnet, shewed what Lauderdale's party were capable of. It likewise gave an ill character of the duke's zeal for justice and false swearing, though that had been the chief topic of discourse with him for above three years. He was angry at a supposed practice with witnesses when it fell on his own party; but now, that there were evident proofs of perjury and subornation, he stopt proceedings under pretence of referring it to the king, who was never made acquainted with it, or at least, never inquired after the proof of these allegations, nor ordered any proceedings against them.'

The main business of this parliament was the act concerning the new test. The bill was brought in and voted in one day, viz. on the 31st of August, though the matters contained in it were of such importance as required the most mature deliberation. It had been promised, at the begining of the session, that, upon passing an act for maintaining the succession, all the security they could desire for the protestant religion should be given. Accordingly, when the first act relating to religion was read and passed, it appeared so general, that many thought it an insufficient security, and therefore, a test was proposed for all that should be capable of any office in church or state, or of electing or being elected members of parliament, that they should adhere firmly to the protestant religion; but then the court thought proper to burden this with a declaration against all resistance, a renouncing the covenants, and an obligation to defend the king's rights and prerogatives, and never to meet nor treat of any matters, civil or ecclesiastical, but by permission from the throne, and never to attempt any alteration of the government either in church or state.' This became matter of great debate, and with difficulty a clause was got in ratifying the Confession of Faith established by the first parliament of James VI. 1567. But then the king's lawful sons and brothers were expresly excepted from this test. In short the act passed by a majority only of seven votes.

The earl of Argyll, in reasoning upon the oath enjoined by the act, said, 'He was of opinion, that as few public oaths should be required as might be, and these as short and clear as possible; he thought a very small addition to the oaths in force these 20 years might suffice, since it is evident the oath of allegiance and declaration had effectually debarred all fanatics from places of trust all this time. It is true, some papists have swallowed them, but a word or two of addition might likeways hold them out.' He likeways opposed the concluding clause excepting the lawful sons and brothers, and said, 'It is our happiness that the king and people were of one religion by law; he hoped the parliament would do nothing to loose what was fast, or open a gap for the royal family to differ in religion; and therefore wished, if any exception was made, it might be made particular for his royal highness.' But the commissioner rising up opposed this openly; whereupon the earl concluded with his tears, 'That, if this exception did pass, it would do more prejudice to the protestant religion than all the rest of the act, yea, many acts would do good.'

I cannot here omit one thing taken notice of by bishop Burnet, who says, that 'some proposed that there should be two tests; one for papists with higher incapacities, and another for presbyterians with milder censures. But that was rejected with much scorn, some making their court, by saying they were more in danger from the presbyterians than from the papists; and it was reported that Paterson, then bishop of Edinburgh, said to the duke, that he thought the two religions, popish and protestant, were so equally stated in his mind, that a few grains of loyalty, in which the protestants had the better of the papists, turned the balance with him.' Well the act passed, by which all in places of trust in church and state (the king's lawful brother and sons only excepted) were obliged to take the following oath by the first of January next, viz.

'I N. N. solemnly swear in presence of the eternal God, whom I invocate as judge and witness of my sincere intention in this my sincere oath, that I own and sincerely profess the true protestant religion contained in the Confession of Faith, recorded in the first parliament of king James VI. and that I believe the same to be founded on, and agreeable to the written word of God: and I promise and swear, that I shall adhere thereto during all the days of my lifetime, and shall endeavour to educate my children therein, and shall never consent to any change or alteration contrary thereunto; and that I disown and renounce all such principles, doctrines, or practices, whether popish or fanatical, which are contrary unto, and inconsistent with the said protestant religion and Confession of Faith. And, for testification of my obedience to my most gracious sovereign Charles II. I do affirm and swear, by this my solemn oath, that the king's majesty is the only supreme governor of this realm, over all persons, and in all causes, as well ecclesiastical as civil; and that no foreign prince, person, pope, prelate, state, or potentate, hath, or ought to have, any jurisdiction, power, superiority, pre eminency, or authority, ecclesiastical or civil, within this realm; and therefore I do utterly renounce and forsake all foreign jurisdictions, power, superiorities and authorities; and do promise, that from henceforth I shall bear faith and true allegiance to the king's majesty, his heirs and lawful successors; and to my power, shall assist and defend all rights, jurisdictions, prerogatives, privileges, pre eminencies and authorities belonging to the king's majesty, his heirs, and lawful successors. And I farther affirm and swear, by this my solemn oath, that I judge it unlawful for subjects, upon pretence of reformation, or any pretence whatsomever, to enter into covenants or leagues, or to convocate, convene, or assemble in any councils, conventions, or assemblies, to treat, consult, or determine, in any matter of state, civil or ecclesiastic, without his majesty's special command, or expres licence, had thereunto, or to take up arms against the king, or those commissionate by him; and that I shall never so rise in arms, or enter into such covenants or assemblies: and that there lies no obligation upon me from the National Covenant, or the solemn League and Covenant, (so commonly called) or any other manner of way whatsomever, to endeavour any change or alteration in the government, either in church or state, as it is now established by the laws of this kingdom. And I promise and swear, that I shall, with my utmost power, defend, assist, and maintain his majesty's jurisdiction foresaid against all deadly; and I shall never decline his majesty's power and jurisdiction, as I shall answer to God. And, finally, I affirm and swear, that this my solemn oath is given in the plain gennine sense and meaning of the words, without any equivocation, mental reservation, or any manner of evasion whatsomever; and that I shall not accept or use any dispensation from any creature whatsoever. So help me God.'

If nothing could have been said against this abominable oath, but that the one part of it contradicted the other, that was sufficient to have deterred all from taking it. Thus the Confession of Faith, which here sworn to, asserts Christ to be the Head of the church; and says, 'in which honours and offices, if men or angels presume to intrude themselves we utterly detest and abhor them;' and yet it is sworn, that the king is the only supreme in all causes, as well ecclesiastical as civil. In the said confession it is reckoned among good works, 'to honour princes and rulers, to obey their charges, not repugnant to the commandment of God, to save the lives of innocents, to repress tyranny, to defend the oppressed,' &c. But here they not only swear to unlimited subjection, but declare it unlawful to take up arms against the king, or those having his commission, upon any pretence whatsoever. Mr Wodrow justly observes, that this oath is a medley of popery, prelacy, erastianism and self-contradiction; the National Covenant, the great bulwark against popery, is thereby renounced, and prelacy, and the utmost extent of the supremacy sworn to. Nay, they swear to maintain the protestant religion, and yet to bring in a popish successor. Though this oath was at first only designed for those in places of trust, yet it afterwards became an universal test of loyalty, and the foundation of great persecution, as shall be related. And though it may be thought surprising that so many fell in with this self contradictory and wicked imposition, yet the multitude of wicked oaths, bonds, and obligations imposed since the unhappy restoration, took off the impression on men's minds as to the solemnity of an oath; and ſince the wicked generation hath trampled upon the ſacred covenants of the nation, it is not at all ſurpriſing though God gave them up to ſtrong deluſions and the belief of lies.

It will not be improper to inſert here what biſhop Burnet ſays on this ſubject, when relating the ſenſe of the beſt of the epiſcopal clergy: 'They were, ſays he, highly offended at the great extent of the prerogative in the point of ſupremacy, by which the king turned out biſhops at pleaſure by a letter. It was hard enough to bear this; but it ſeemed intolerable to oblige men by oath to maintain it. The king might by a proclamation put down even epiſcopacy itſelf, as the law then ſtood, and by this oath they would be bound to maintain even that. All meetings in ſynods, or for ordinations, were hereafter to be held only by permiſſion, ſo that all the viſible ways of preſerving religion depended now wholly on the king's good pleaſure; and they ſaw that this would be a very feeble tenure under a popiſh king. The king tied to all this by oath ſeemed very hard; and, when a church was yet in ſo imperfect a ſtate, without liturgy or diſcipline, (the former argued no great imperfection, though the latter did) it was a ſtrange impoſition to make people ſwear never to endeavour any alteration either in church or ſtate.'

When the teſt was thus impoſed, and all were to ſwear it by the firſt of January, under the penalties of being for ever declared incapable of any public truſt, and of the loſs of their moveable and liferent eſcheats, there were not many in public offices made any ſcruple, except the earl of Argyll, of whom we ſhall hear in its proper place. The earl of Queenſberry, being a friend, was permitted to take the teſt with an explication: the laird of Hopeton, ſcrupling the oath, was diveſted of his office of ſheriff of Linlithgow: the ducheſs of Rothes was urged to take it, but ſhe refuſed: the duke of Monmouth alſo refuſed: the duke of Hamilton had his ſcruples concerning it, and was willing the council ſhould name deputies in any juriſdictions belonging to him: there were likewiſe a few others whom I ſhall not here mention. The privy counſellors took it on the 22d of September, repeating the words of the oath on their knees.

But the oppoſition made by ſome of the conformable clergy made great noiſe. Biſhop Burnet ſays, 'Some, or all of theſe exceptions, mentioned by him above, did run ſo generally through the whole body of the clergy, that they were all ſhaking in their reſolutions. To prevent this an explanation was drawn by biſhop Paterſon, (one, ſays my author, of the moſt violent defenders of it) and paſſed in council. It was by it declared, that it was not meant that thoſe who took the teſt ſhould be bound to every article in the Confeſſion of Faith, but only in ſo far as it contained the doctrine upon which the Proteſtant churches had ſettled the reformation; and that the teſt did not cut off thoſe rights which were acknowleged to have been in the primitive church for the firſt 300 years after Chriſt; and an aſſurance was given that the king never intended to change the government of the church: by this it was pretended that the greateſt difficulties were now removed. But to this it was anſwered, that they were to ſwear they took the oath in the literal ſenſe of the words; ſo that, if this explanation was not conform to the literal ſenſe, they would be perjured who took it upon this explanation. The impoſers of an oath could only declare the ſenſe of it; but that could not be done by any other, much leſs by a lower authority, ſuch as the privy-council was confeſſed to be; yet, when men are to be undone, if they do not ſubmit to a hard law, they willingly catch at any thing that ſeems to reſolve their doubts. About 80, continues the biſhop, of the moſt learned and pious of the clergy left all, rather than comply with the terms of this law; and theſe were noted to be the beſt preachers, and the moſt zealous enemies to popery, that belonged to that church. The biſhops, who thought their refuſing the teſt was a reproach to thoſe who took it, treated them with much contempt, and put them to many hardſhips.'

It is certain, though the moſt of the prelatical clergy ſwallowed this oath, which ſhews what ſort of men they were, yet ſeveral made the beſt ſtand they ever made before; particularly, the miniſters of Aberdeen drew up ſome queries againſt the teſt, as, 1. How can I ſwear that the Confeſſion of Faith is the true ſtandard of the proteſtant religion, &c. which forbids the reſiſting of the magiſtrate only conditionally, while they paſs not over the bounds of their office, and ſays it is a good work to bear down tyranny? 2. How can I ſwear, that the king is the only ſupreme governor over all perſons, and in all cauſes, when the ſaid Confeſſion obliges me to believe Jeſus Chriſt to be the only Head of the church? &c. 3. If I believe the preſent eſtabliſhed church to be of divine and apoſtolic authority, how can I ſwear that is in the king's power to alter or change the ſame? and, if it be in its own nature indifferent, how can I ſwear to that which the king can alter at his pleaſure? 4. How can I ſwear to defend the king's privileges and prerogatives, till I know and conſider whether they be conſiſtent with the principles of religion, &c? 5. How can I ſwear that I judge it unlawful, upon any pretence whatſoever, to enter into leagues and covenants without the king's conſent, when it was lawful, in the firſt days of Chriſtianity, to enter into a covenant with Chriſt, and a league with one another, though not to caſt off the yoke of ſecular princes, yet to caſt off the yoke of judaiſm, paganiſm, and idolatry, even contrary to the expreſs command of earthly ſovereigns? And, ſhould popery prevail, would it be unlawful for ſubjects to enter into covenant for ſhaking off the Roman yoke? Does not that clauſe in the teſt condemn our reformation in Scotland? 6. Can I ſwear, ſincerely, that I judge it unlawful for ſubjects to meet in order to conſult or determine in any matter of ſtate, civil or eccleſiaſtical, when I have no ſecurity, from the teſt, or laws of the land, but that clauſe may comprehend the aſſemblies and meetings for the worſhip of God, and the ordinary exercife of diſcipline, eſpecially when all the eccleſiaſtical meetings are put in the king's hand, by the act Nov. 16. 1669, &c.? And, ſhould our meetings for worſhip and diſcipline be, in proceſs of time, forbid, would it be unlawful to meet with one another for theſe purpoſes? 7. Can I ſwear that I am under no obligations to endeavour any alteration of the government in church or ſtate, as now eſtabliſhed? It muſt be a perfect conſtitution that needs no change in any circumſtances, and yet an alteration in circumſtances is a change; yea, the confeſſion preſcribed in the teſt ſays, that no policy or order of ceremonies in the church can be appointed for all ages, places, and times, becauſe what is now convenient may prove burdenſome at another time, or in other circumſtances. May I not pray to God almighty to put it into the hearts of men to reform what is amiſs? and yet to pray is ſome ſort of endeavour. What if the king's power in national ſynods, by act of parliament, be deſtructive of true church power? What if there be ſome thing in the act of reſtitution of biſhops to be amended? 8. Is there no more in this teſt than in the acts of parliament, or former oaths upon which it is founded? In the acts againſt aſſembling the king's lieges this clauſe is added, (except in ordinary judgments) but there is no ſuch clauſe in the teſt, by which I ſwear, that I judge it unlawful to convene or aſſemble upon any pretence whatſoever, even though to worſhip God with others. In the declaration it is ſaid, there lyeth no obligation upon me from the covenants to endeavour reformation; but the teſt adds, or upon any other manner of way. May I not be under ſome obligations, though from neither of the covenants? And, though I be under no obligation for the preſent, may I not be under ſome afterwards? If there be no more in this teſt than in former oaths, why it is impoſed on thoſe who took the declaration, &c.? To all this might be added the evil of impoſing and multiplying oaths.

There were ſeveral other things publiſhed at this time by ſome of the conform clergy, againſt the teſt. The biſhop and ſynod of Aberdeen, the biſhop of Dunkeld and ſynod of Perth, publiſhed their reſpective explications of this oath, declaring the ſenſe in which they took it. This unexpected ſtir among the clergy made the managers look about them, ſo that, as we have heard, biſhop Paterſon and the council made a ſort of explication of it, which was approved of by the king: however, the generality went into it; ſo that thoſe who refuſed it were expoſed to perſecution, ſecution, and ſeveral quitted their charges; for the council made an act requiring the patrons to provide fit and qualified perſons in the room of thoſe who ſhould unduifully refuſe to take the teſt betwixt and the firſt of January, certifying, that, if the patrons did not comply with this, they ſhould be eſteemed perſons diſſaffected to his majeſty's perſon and government. I ſhall only remark, that, if ſome of the conformable clergy, who for once became recuſants, began to feel a little of the wholeſome ſeverities of the managers, the reader cannot be ſurprited at the ſufferings of the preſbyterians.

During theſe proceedings about the teſt ſeveral occurrences happened, which it will not be improper to relate. Accordingly, on the firſt of October, Mr Gabriel Semple, who had been priſoner for ſome time, was, in conſequence of a petition he preſented, ordered to be releaſed upon bond to appear when called under the penalty of 10,000 merks. This worthy miniſter was ſon of Sir Bryce Semple of Cathcart, and was ordained miniſter of Kirkpatrick Durham, from which he was ejected by the Glaſgow act. He then repaired to the houſe of Corſack, where he preached to all that came to hear him; but the numbers were ſo great, that he was obliged to take to the fields and preach there; and theſe were the firſt field-meetings in Scotland. When he found himſelf obliged to leave that houſe, Mr John Welſh continued and kept up thoſe meetings in the open fields from mere neceſſity. Soon after Mr Semple returned to Galloway, joined Mr Welſh, and continued preaching along with him till Pentland. About a year after that, being intercommuned he went to Ireland, and from thence to the borders of England. After abſconding ſome time he preached at Haſelridge and diſpenſed the Lord's ſupper, having Dr Rule and another miniſter from Berwick aſſiſting him. As the incumbent of Foord was a poor melancholy perſon, Mr Semple, through the good nature of ſeveral gentlemen in the neighbourhood, had poſſeſſion of that church for ſome years, and diſpenſed the word and ſacraments with great ſucceſs among the rude borderers. He continued there till the death of his conſort, the daughter of Sir Walter Riddel of Riddel, ſo that a little before Bothwell he returned to Scotland, but the diviſions in the weſt country ſtill prevented his joining in that enterpriſe. He was apprehended by a party of the guards, being then ill of an ague. Nevertheleſs he was carried to the Canongate priſon, where he continued till the parliament this year was up. Soon after he was releaſed he was called before a committee of the council, on pretence that his petition was forged. The clerk, in reading it, added ſome words of his own. Mr Semple, being aſked if he owned that petition, deſired to ſee it; and, obſerving that it was the ſame he had given in, but that the clerk had read it otherways than it was, declared that that was the paper he had given in, thanked them for his liberty, and prayed for the ſpirit of grace and government to his majeſty; then he was diſmiſſed, without being obliged to renew his bond for his appearance. But how unjuſtly people were entreated at this time muſt be left with the reader. In a few weeks he was again ſummoned before them; but by the advice of his friends, he went to England, and continued there till the king's death. After the revolution he was fixed at Jedburgh, where he finiſhed his courſe with joy 1706. But to return,

On the 7th of October Robert Garnock hammerman in Stirling, Patrick Forman in the pariſh of Allon, David Pairie, James Stuart, George Lapſley and Alexander Ruſſel were before the juſticiary. They had all diſclaimed the king's authority, and now adhered to their confeſſions, and were ſentenced to be hanged at the Gallow lee, betwixt Leith and Edinburgh on the tenth, George Lapſley got off, by means of ſome, who, being impriſoned for debt, and could not endure the godly exerciſes of the ſufferers, broke priſon for them, whereby ſeverals made their eſcape. Robert Garnock had been two years in priſon. James Stuart was but a youth; he happened to come from the weſt to ſee a relation who was in priſon at Edinburgh; his friend got out, and he, being found in the room, was brought before a committee of the council, and ſoon enſnared by their queſtions. When he was ſilent as to ſome things, Sir George MacKenzie threatened to pull his tongue out with a pair of pincers. How hard it was to take up perſons againſt whom no matter of fact could be proved, and to condemn them to death upon the anſwers they gave to their enſnaring queſtions, muſt be left with the reader. Before the jury withdrew, the priſoners gave them a ſigned proteſtation, adviſing them to conſider what they were doing, and declaring that they were no rebels, nor diſowned any authority which was according to the word of God, and covenants which the land was bound by. They charged them to conſider how deep a guilt covenant-breaking was, and put them in mind that they were to anſwer before the Great Judge of all for what they did in this matter. And, after mentioning ſeveral acts of their injuſtice and cruelty, they aſſured them that their blood would one day lie heavy upon them. However, the jury brought them in guilty, and, except George Lapſley, they were all executed at the Gallowlee, according to their ſentence. Their teſtimonies are in the Cloud of Witneſſes. The reaſon why the place of execution was changed, was becauſe the multitude of executions at the croſs and Grain-market drew ſuch a number of ſpectators, who were ſo much moved at the conduct of the ſufferers, that it was thought expedient to put them to death where the moſt notorious malefactors uſed to be executed. Their bodies were buried under the gallows, and their heads and hands ſet up on the Pleaſants port.

Mr James Renwick was a ſpectator of this execution, and, being now much eſteemed by the ſuffering wanderers, to whom he had joined himſelf, he aſſembled ſome friends, and removed the bodies of theſe five martyrs in the night-time, and interred them in the Weſt-churchyard of Edinburgh. They likewiſe took down their heads and hands, but, not being able to bury them with their bodies, they interred them in the garden of one A. Tweedie, who was with them, where they lay till the 7th of October 1726, when they were taken up and buried on the 19th. P. Walker, who was preſent, gives a particular account of this interment, which I do not think material to inſert here.

On the 8th of October, the council, being informed that many heritors, who had been forfeited in abſence for Bothwell, reſided at or near their own dwelling-houſes, iſſued a proclamation for apprehending and bringing to juſtice all mentioned p. 761, together with Gilbert Macllwraith of Dumchory, Thomas MacJarrow of Bar, John MacJarrow of Benjarrow, Henry MacJarrow of Athalbany, Geo. MacChir of Benham, Henry Macllwraith of Auchinflour, John Alexander of Dumachry, MacUnken in Kilkertoun, Allan Bowy of Drumley, James Wood in Ayr, Pat. MacDougal of Freugh, Meſſ. William and Alex. Gordons of Earlſtoun, Mr Will. Ferguſon of Kaitloch, Dumbar younger of Machriemoir, John Bell of Whiteſide, John Gibſon of Auchinebero, Gibſon younger of Inglistoun, Gordon of Dundeuch, Grier of Dalgonar, Smith of Kilroch, MacClellan of Balmagahen, Gordon of Craigie, Lenox of Irelantoun, Gordon of Barharran, John Fowbertoun of Auchinrie, David MacCulloch ſon to Ardwell, Will. Whitehead of Millnhouſe, John Welſh of Cornley, Neilſon of Corſack, Rob MacClelland of Barſcob, his brother Samuel, Fullertoun of Nethermill, Geo. On the 11th of October, John Dryſdale, James Pollock, James Wharrey, and John Anderſon were baniſhed for conventicles. Nothing could be proved againſt them, only they would not ſwear againſt themſelves.

The encouragement given to informers procured great trouble to the non-conformiſts. There was particularly an idle wicked fellow, one Greenſhiels a weaver, who offered his ſervice to ſome of the counſellors; accordingly orders were given to the commanding officers at Glaſgow to furniſh this new tool with what men he pleaſed. Having got a party of about 20 ſoldiers he came about midnight to the houſe of Douchal in the pariſh of Kilmacolm. The gentleman aſking the reaſon of their diſturbing him at that time of night, Greenſhiels told him he had orders to ſearch his houſe for field-preachers, &c. The doors were opened, but none could be found; however, the gentleman was obliged to ſuffer them to quarter upon him for ſeveral days, till they had conſumed moſt of the family proviſions. At laſt they rifled the houſe, took away the ſilver ſpoons and knives, and then retired. It is true Greenſhiels was taken, and, the ſpoons being found about him, was ordered to be whipt. This was one piece of juſtice. The reader may judge what the encouragers and employers of ſuch a villain muſt deſerve.

Some time in this month of October the duke of York made another progreſs to the weſt, and declared himſelf much pleaſed with the reſpect that was paid him, and the entertainment he met with; but it ſeems he ſoon forgot all this, when he afterwards declared that it would never be well till all the ſouth-ſide of Forth were made a hunting-field. His mirth was interrupted by a proteſt that was put into his hands by one of the ſocieties, as he was going along the ſtreet in Glaſgow. In this paper, 'They proteſted againſt the king in all his tyranny, heading, hanging, &c. the people of God; againſt the teſt, and welcoming a papiſt to Scotland with a draught of the blood of the ſaints at two different times, &c. whereas ſay they, he ought to be puniſhed with ſuch loading puniſhments as the word of God allows to be inflicted on profeſt idolaters,' &c. The duke, upon reading the paper, did not think it proper to take much notice of it for the preſent. However, it made him ſullen and penſive; ſo that he haſted from Glaſgow as ſoon as he could, and it is remarkable, that none concerned in it were ever diſcovered.

On the 3d of November Sir Pat. Hepburn of Blackcaſtle was fined in 2001. ſterling for harbouring and converſing with Mr Semple. The ſame day Mr Veitch at Mauchlin, and Mr Robert Miller at Ochiltree, were charged for breaking their inſtructions, and excommunicating, or debarring from the Lord's table, thoſe who had taken the declaration and bond of peace, and renounced the covenants, and not appearing, were ordered to be denounced and put to the horn. On the 24th Mr Veitch appeared before the council, and petitioned againſt the ſaid ſentence; but the advocate brought a new charge againſt him, for taking parents engaged, when he baptized their children, to bring them up according to the covenants and for breaking his confinement. Mr Veitch pleaded not guilty; and, no proof being ready, was acquitted. Mr Hutchiſon got not ſo well off; for when he appeared, ſome months after, and refuſing to anſwer upon oath to his charge, was deprived of his indulgence. The ſame day Tho. Crawford was releaſed from a long impriſonment; but Mr Tho. Archer was ſtill kept in hold until they ſhould get witneſſes againſt him. We ſhall hear more of him afterwards.

Matters were now come to a very low paſs: for, on the one hand, the generality of the preſbyterian miniſters had ſo far complied with the indulgence, that they who ſtrictly adhered to the principles maintained by Mr Cameron and Mr Cargill had no freedom to ſubmit to them; and having none now to officiate among them as miniſters, ſince the martyrdom of Mr Cargill, they judged it expedient, in their preſent diſtreſſed circumſtances, to form themſelves into ſocieties; and the better to maintain the common cauſe of religion and liberty, they united in a general correſpondence, to be kept up through the ſhires ſeverally, and all the ſhires conjunctly, where ſuch as owned their teſtimony againſt popery, prelacy, eraſtianiſm and tyranny, reſided. By this means, though they were ſtill the more open to the reſentment of their perſecutors, yet they attained to a better underſtanding of one another, and were in a capacity to contribute more to their mutual advantage. They had their firſt general meeting, on the 15th of December this year, at the Logan-houſe in the pariſh of Leſmahago in the ſhire of Lanerk, where they agreed upon their teſtimony againſt the laſt parliament, the duke of York, a papiſt, as being commiſſioner, and appointed it to be publiſhed at the market-croſs of Lanerk, on the 12th of January next year. They held their general meetings once a quarter, or oftener, as they could moſt conveniently.

But the moſt remarkable thing about this time was the proſecution of Archibald earl of Argyll for his explication of the teſt, which he had before oppoſed in parliament. This noble peer was the repreſentative of one of the moſt ancient and powerful families in Scotland; and, by reaſon of the offices he held, was comprehended under the teſt act. When the earl was at Edinburgh he was ordered by one of the clerks of the council to attend next council-day, being the 3d of November, and take teſt. The earl upon this, went to the duke of York, and complained of this treatment, ſince the time appointed by the parliament was not yet expired; but all was to no purpoſe. The duke wanted to get rid of this noble peer, who ſtood in the way of his deſigns However, matters were ſo managed, that the earl, with the approbation both of the duke and council, was permitted to take the oath with an explanation, which indeed was no more than the council themſelves had done, as has been related, which makes their treatment of him the more baſe and unaccountable. Accordingly, on the third of November, his lordſhip came to the council, and, with a loud voice, made the following explanatory declaration, 'I have conſidered the teſt, and am deſirous to give obedience as far as I can. I am confident the parliament never intended to impoſe contradictory oaths, therefore I think no man can explain it but for himſelf. Accordingly I take it in as far as it is conſiſtent with itſelf and the proteſtant religion; and I do declare I mean not to bind up myſelf, in my ſtation, and in a lawful way, to wiſh and endeavour any alteration I think to the advantage of the church or ſtate, not repugnant to the proteſtant religion and my loyalty; and this I underſtand as part of my oath.' Then the oath was adminiſtered to him, and immediately he took his place as a privy counſellor. Next day he waited on his royal highneſs, by whom he was told that his explication did not pleaſe him; that he thought it was to be a ſhort one, like Queenſberry's, and added, Well, it paſſed with you, but it ſhall paſs ſo with no other. The earl underſtood this as an acceptance, and that, if he had committed any fault the duke had paſſed it over, and would puſh the matter no farther. But his lordſhip was miſtaken; for a deſign was formed to proſecute him for high treaſon on account of his explanation; and the ſame day Argyll was called before the council, as commiſſioner of the treaſury, again to take the teſt. Whether this was not requiring a vain repetition of the oath muſt be left to the reader. The earl offered to take the teſt as before; whereupon a member of the council deſired the words might be repeated. His lordſhip, obſerving a deſign upon him, declined repeating, till being urged by the duke, he told that he had committed to writing what he had delivered, to prevent miſtakes, which was produced and read. Argyll would have ſigned it, but, perceiving their intentions, he waved that: upon which he was removed; and, after they had concerted their meaſures among themſelves, was called in again, and told, that he had not given the ſatisfaction required by the act of parliament, and ſo could not ſit in council, nor act as a commiſſioner of the treaſury. His lordſhip made a proper reply, and removed. Next morning he waited on the duke, and expreſſed his ſurpriſe, that what he had ſaid in his explication ſhould be thought a crime. The duke ſaid, That the words were unneceſſary and groundleſs, and that he was not tied up by the oath as he imagined; and, after a pauſe, added, As I have already told you, you have cheated yourſelf, you have taken the teſt. Then the earl anſwered, that he hoped his highneſs was ſatisfied. The duke then complained that the earl had not voted the council's explication. Argyll anſwered, that he was not preſent at the debates. The duke inſiſted, that he could not but underſtand the affair, and added, with a frown, you, with ſome others, have deſigned to bring trouble upon a handful of poor Catholics, that would live peaceably however they were uſed; but it ſhould light upon others. This was plain dealing, and ſhewed what was to be expected when he ſhould have the whole management in his own hands. They parted, after the duke had laid his commands on him not to go out of town till he ſaw him again, which his lordſhip complied with.

The deſign againſt the earl being now formed, he was ordered that ſame night to continue at Edinburgh till next council-day, which was November 8th, when the council ſat ſent one of their clerks to command him to enter himſelf priſoner in the caſtle of Edinburgh before 12 o'clock next day, which he alſo complied with, and ordered the advocate to purſue him for treaſon, or ſuch other crimes as ſhall be thought convenient, as the act of council more fully bears; and at the ſame time they wrote an account of their proceedings to the king; but it is remarkable, that they ordered this noble peer to be perſecuted, as above, before they had any permiſſion from the king. On the 22d of November the king's letter, dated November 15th, was read in council, in which he ſignified his approbation of their proceedings againſt the earl; only required them to acquaint him before they came to any ſentence. But, before the council had this return, Argyll was ſummoned to anſwer a charge of leaſing making, and depraving the king's laws. And ſuch was the baſeneſs of his lordſhip's perſecutors, that they pretended, nay, one of them told him, that nothing was intended againſt him but to take his heritable offices from him. And when the duke of York was told that it was hard meaſure, upon ſuch grounds, to threaten ſuch a perſon with the forfeiture of life and fortune, he anſwered, Life and fortune! God forbid; and, if he was privy to the deſigns then formed, he acted only ſuitable to his religion. When the king's letter was received, the advocate was appointed to form an indictment for treaſon and perjury, as leaſing-making and depraving the king's laws, to which he was to anſwer, before the lords of juſticiary, on the 12th of December next.

On the 12th of December his lordſhip was brought before the juſticiary, conſiſting of the earl of Queenſberry juſtice-general, lords Nairn, Collingtoun, Forret, Newtoun and Kirkhouſe. The indictment was read, in which he was charged with declaring againſt and defaming the act enjoining the teſt, by inſinuating that the parliament had impoſed a contradictory oath, and that the ſaid oath was inconſiſtent with itſelf, and with the proteſtant religion, and conſequently that the king and parliament had acted inconſiſtent with the proteſtant religion; and for treaſonably invading the royal legiſlative power, &c. as the indictment itſelf more fully bears. An unbiaſſed reader, by comparing this nobleman's explication with his indictment, will ſee that the crimes charged upon him were without any ſolid foundation. Sir George Lockhart and Sir John Dalrymple pleaded with great accuracy and judgment for the earl, ſo that the debates continued till nine o'clock at night. There were but four of the lords with the juſtice general at the debates. The lord Nairn, who was then old and infirm, could not continue all the time of the trial, and ſo went home to bed. The lords Collingtoun and Kirkhouſe inſiſted that the earl was not guilty of leaſing making and treaſon, and the other two viz. Newton and Forret, inſiſted that he was. Queenſberry not chuſing to give the caſting vote againſt the earl. Nairn was brought from his bed to the court, that numbers might ſupply the want of law and reaſon, and gave his vote againſt the earl. It was two in the morning before theſe things were over, and then they adjourned till next day, when the lords pronounced their interlocutor, wherein they declared the earl's defences, with reſpect to perjury, to be ſufficient, but not with reſpect to treaſon and leaſing making.

The paper delivered by the earl, containing his explication of the teſt, was then produced as evidence againſt him; whereupon the jury withdrew, and in a little brought in their verdict that the earl was guilty of treaſon, leaſing-making and leaſing telling, but not guilty of perjury. The council, upon this met, and wrote an account of what had paſſed to the king; from all which it is evident that a deſign was formed againſt the earl's life. Biſhop Burnet ſays, 'No ſentence, in our age, was more univerſally cried out on than this. All people ſpoke of it, and of the duke who drove it on, with horror. All that was ſaid to leſſen that was, that duke Lauderdale had reſtored the family with ſuch an extended juriſdiction, that he was really the maſter of all the Highlands; ſo that it was fit to attaint him, that, by a new reſtoring them, theſe grants might be better limited.

However, all his friends were of opinion that he ought to provide for his ſafety. A gentleman was diſpatched to court by the earl, who, as ſoon as the king's mind, in anſwer to the council's letter, was known, came off, and outrode the bearer of it. By him Argyll found that the ſentence of death was to be paſſed upon him, and that the king would be prevailed with to yield to the execution; nay, before the gentleman's arrival, his lordſhip had notice, that on the 21ſt he was to be ſent to the common jail, to which peers uſed to be removed a few days before their execution: and therefore, on Tueſday the 20th, about eight in the evening, he came out in diſguiſe, and very narrowly eſcaped.

When the earl got out, he rode, without ſtopping, to a country ale-houſe near the houſe of Mr George Pringle of Torwoodlee, who, by concert, was to meet him there, and conduct him to Mr William Veitch's houſe in Northumberland. The earl went by the name of Mr Hope.

Mr Hope and Mr Pringle came ſafe to Mr Veitch's, while he was at Berwick viſiting his friends, and continued there till Saturday ſe'ennight when Mr Veitch came home. The beginning of the following week Mr Hope, Mr Veitch and two ſervants ſet out for London; but they were obliged to part with the two ſervants on the road, to prevent ſuſpicion, for the alarm of the earl's eſcape was now general, and a reward of 500 l. was offered to any who ſhould apprehend him. However, he and Mr Veitch got ſafe to Batterſea near London, where they were conducted to the houſe of one Mr Smith a ſugar-baker, whoſe lady was a gentlewoman of great piety, prudence and generoſity. He continued concealed in and about London till he got over to Holland. Biſhop Burnet ſays, 'One that ſaw him knew him, and went and told the king of it; but he would have no ſearch made for him, and retained ſtill very good thoughts of him.' But to return to Edinburgh.

The day after Argyll's eſcape the council iſſued a proclamation for apprehending him; a copy of which they ſent to the king, and next day had a return to their former letter, wherein his majeſty, as an evidence of the good thoughts he had of the earl, allowed ſentence of death to be paſſed upon him. Accordingly, on the 23d, the lords of juſticiary, by virtue of an order of council, whoſe tools they were, paſſed ſentence accordingly, ordering the earl to be executed, when apprehended, in what manner the king ſhould appoint. The parliament, after the revolution, was ſo ſenſible of the injuſtice of this ſentence, that they not only repealed his attainder, but alſo allowed his ſon to bring action of damages for a conſiderable ſum againſt the heirs of thoſe judges who condemned his father. I ſhall only add here, that it was upon this ſentence that Argyll was executed 1685, as ſhall be related in its proper place.

When the managers were diſappointed by the earl's eſcape, they went on to proſecute the preſbyterians, eſpecially their miniſters, many of whom had not accepted the indulgence; and though they did not chuſe to preach in the fields, becauſe of the ſeverity of the times, yet they preached as frequently in houſes as they could with conveniency. The duke of York mightily careſſed the biſhops, and ſupported them in all their meaſures againſt their non-conform brethren; for it is the pleaſure of papiſts to ſee proteſtants devouring one another, ſo that there was ſcarcely a preſbyterian came before the council that met with any favour. This appeared very evident in the caſe of the Rev. Mr Fraſer of Brae.

This miniſter had been informed againſt for a field-conventicle, whereupon he and his bail were ſummoned before the council in November laſt; but, ſome of the members being aſſured that it was only a houſe-conventicle, the citation was dropt. Mean while, when Mr Fraſer went north, he was ſeized with an ague. His bail, Sir Hugh Campbell of Calder, propoſed writing to the advocate, or biſhop Paterſon. Mr Fraſer was againſt this, becauſe, as he told Sir Hugh, did the prelates hear of his indiſpoſition, they would puſh his citation the harder, that, in caſe of non-appearance, his bond of 5000 merks might be forfeited, &c. Nevertheleſs the gentleman wrote to the biſhop, acquainting him that Mr Fraſer had not preached in the fields, and was now dangerouſly ill.

The biſhop, upon receiving this letter, ordered matters ſo, that next day Mr Fraſer was ſummoned to appear before before the council on the 22d of December. Sir Hugh was a gentleman of a good eſtate, and had been bail for preſbyterian miniſters for upwards of 1700 l. ſterling; and therefore they expected that Mr Fraſer would not be able to attend, and Sir Hugh's bond for 5000 merks would be forfeited; but Mr Fraſer, rather than his bail ſhould ſuffer on his account, notwithſtanding his own indiſpoſition, the inclemency of the ſeaſon, and the danger his life was in, conſidering what ſtretches had been made in the caſe of Argyll, undertook the journey, and came to Edinburgh the day before the time appointed for his appearance.

The biſhops and council were not a little ſurpriſed to ſee him at the bar. After ſome ſilence his indictment was read, wherein he was charged with preaching in the fields, and without authority, and venting pernicious and rebellious principles, &c. and for proof, the matter was put to his oath. He deſired a delay a few days, but that was refuſed. However, he obtained liberty to ſpeak, and in his ſpeech told them that he had not preached in the fields ſince he came from the Baſs, nor yet without authority; that he had never preached ſeditious principles, nor doctrines inconſiſtent with the Scripture and the Confeſſion of Faith compoſed in James VI's time, which he conceived the laſt parliament had ratified; that he acknowleged magiſtracy as an ordinance of God, and owned the king's authority, even in eccleſiaſtical matters, as the nurſing-father of the church; but that it remained undeniable that this power of the magiſtrate was not privative of an intrinſic power in the church, granted her by Chriſt, for preſerving and edifying herſelf; that he could not comply with the government of the church by archbiſhops and biſhops, &c. and that, as to his practice, he endeavoured to keep a good conſcience both before God and man, &c.

Some of the counſellors were for releaſing him; but the biſhops were againſt it, and repreſented him as a dangerous man that ought to be made an example of for the terror of others. They were intruſted with the drawing up of his ſentence, by which he was ordered to pay 5000 merks for conventicles, and to be ſent to Blackneſs till he paid it. While he was impriſoned at Edinburgh, he preached to the priſoners on the Lord's day. All his petitions for liberty were for ſome time rejected; ſo that, after he had been ſix weeks in priſon at Edinburgh, he was ſent to Blackneſs caſtle, where he continued about ſeven weeks more. When the duke of York returned to England his friends embraced that opportunity to interceed for his releaſe, upon giving bond that he ſhould leave the kingdom. Accordingly he was releaſed and went to London, where we ſhall meet with him again.

CHAP. VII.

Of the declaration at Lanerk: ſome farther proceedings about the teſt: the actings of the council againſt conventicles: the public executions: and other branches of perſecution during the year 1682.

BY the act of parliament laſt year perſons in public offices had till the firſt of January this year to take the teſt; and though ſome few papiſts refuſed it, yet care was taken of them by the duke of York and his creatures, ſo that they were no great loſers, which was not the caſe with proteſtant recuſants.

On the 5th of January the laird of Meldrum, being appointed ſheriff depute of Eaſt Lothian, was empowered to uſe all methods poſſible for ſuppreſſing conventicles there. On the 7th the council ſent a liſt to the king of thoſe offices and juriſdictions which were become vacant by the refuſal of the teſt, and of thoſe whom they thought were fit to ſucceed in them, which his majeſty approved of. On the 9th the ſentence of forfeiture was pronounced by the juſticiary againſt Geo. Arthur of Bunnahill, James Ure of Shirgartoun, Donald Connel in Bucklyvie, heritors in Stirling-ſhire, Thomas Ruſſel of Middleridge, Ed. Marſhal of Kaemuir, John Taylor elder in Holehouſe, John Shaw ſon to John Shaw of Eaſter Greenhill, Geo. Mochrie ſenar of Stonrig, and Tho. Ferguſon of Finnarts, in the ſhire of Ayr. Theſe gentlemen were ſingled out among many others, who, in November laſt, were appointed to be proſecuted before the juſtices for being accеſſory to Bothwell.

The laſt of thoſe gentlemen was not acceſſory to Bothwell; he had an eſtate, and was a preſbyterian. The only proof of any ſuch thing was, that two men ſware, that, a little before Bothwell, a boy came from a houſe in Ballantrae, where Mr Ferguſon was, and warned all the neighbourhood, who had a mind to join the party in arms, to repair to the ſaid houſe to receive money and arms: but, had this been true, the reader is to judge for himſelf, whether it was a ſufficient ground for a forfeiture of life and fortune. Many were the hardſhips he and his family were put to after this.

The ſufferings of the family of James Ure of Shirgartoun were likeways very conſiderable during this period. His houſe was frequently pillaged by parties of ſoldiers. When he was forfeited after Bothwell, where he behaved with courage, his rents and moveables were all ſeized, and many times parties were in ſearch for him, but he happily eſcaped. His mother, a gentlewoman about 70 years of age, was put in priſon at Glaſgow, where ſhe died, notwithſtanding all the intereſt that was made for her. Mean while 100 l. Scots was offered to any who ſhould apprehend Shirgartoun dead or alive; but he eſcaped to Ireland where he continued half a year. Then he ventured home, but was obliged to conceal himſelf in the fields; ſo that, during the winter 1684, he lay in the wood of Balquhan for ſeveral weeks. His lady was apprehended for converſing with her own huſband, and carried priſoner to Stirling, with a ſucking child on her breaſt, and from thence to Edinburgh, and put into the Canongate jail. At laſt the managers, being aſhamed of this piece of conduct, thought fit to releaſe her. Shirgartoun ſurvived his troubles, and lived till after the unnatural rebellion 1715, when he ſaw vengeance overtake ſome of his perſecutors.

On the 12th the council ordered letters to be wrote to the patrons of 21 pariſhes, now vacant by the miniſters refuſing the teſt, to plant them with proper perſons with all convenient ſpeed; ſo that here were 21 of the preſbyterian clergy who ſcrupled the teſt. However, ſome of them got their ſcruples removed, particularly Mr Alex. Wood miniſter of Cockpen, who, upon taking this oath, was ordered to get a new preſentation to his pariſh. The ſame orders had been given to the magiſtrates of Aberdeen to the reſt of the miniſters there. On the 12th of January the declaration appointed by the ſociety of general correſpondence was publiſhed at Lanerk according to their order; of which the following is a ſhort abſtract. 'Although we ought to take in good part whatever God in his infinite wiſdom hath—carved out unto us,—and acknowlege government and governors as ordained by him, in ſo far as they rule and govern according to the rules ſet down by him in his word, and conſtitutive laws of the nation;——yet when all theſe laws—are caſſed and annulled by pretended laws, and the higheſt uſurpation, and an explicable prerogative in matters eccleſiaſtic, and arbitrary government in matters civil, is arrogate, when a banner of impiety, &c. is diſplayed,—when the parliaments—are ſo prelimited by law, as that no true ſon of the ſtate or church hath liberty to ſit and vote there,—what ſhall the people do in ſuch extremity? Should they give their reaſon as men, their conſciences as Chriſtians, and reſign their liberties, fortunes, religion, and their all, to the inexorable obſtinacy, incurable wilfulneſs and malice of thoſe who, in ſpight of God and man—are reſolved to make their own will the abſolute and ſovereign rule of their actions? ſhall the end of government be loſt through the weakneſs, wickedneſs and tyranny of governors?——Have not the people in ſuch an extremity, good ground to make uſe of that natural and radical power they have to ſhake off that yoke?—Which accordingly the Lord honoured us (in a general and unprelimited meeting of the eſtates and ſhires in Scotland) to do; a convention of unprelimited members, a convention of men who had only the glory of God, and the good of the commonwealth before their eyes. At which convention he was moſt legally, and by general conſent, caſt off by the declaration at Sanquhar. But that we may not ſeem to have done that, or yet to do the like, like, upon no grounds,—we ſhall hint at ſome of the many thouſands of miſdemeanors of the new caſt off tyrant.—And 1. at his very entry, at one blow, in his firſt parliament, he cut off the neck of that noble conſtitution of church and ſtate which our noble worthy anceſtors had made. 2. Did he not take to himſelf a licentious privilege, the exalting himſelf into a ſphere exceeding all meaſures divine and human, both in matters civil and eccleſiaſtic, making us a laughing ſtock to the nations,—who ſay, we have only the law of letters inſtead of the letter of the law? 3. Hath he not adjourned and diſſolved parliaments at his pleaſure? 4. Hath he not ſeated himſelf as ſupreme head over all perſons civil and eccleſiaſtic,—and oppreſſed the godly for conſcience ſake? 5. Time will fail us to narrate what exorbitant taxes, ceſſings, &c. dilapidating the rights and revenues of the crown, for no other end but to employ them for keeping up a brothel rather than a court,—6. He hath in a late parliament, ſecured the ſucceſſion to ſuch a one, if not worſe than himſelf, formed the teſt, &c.' In the concluſion, they offer to prove that they have done nothing contrary to the ancient laws of the kingdom; but only endeavoured to extricate themſelves from a yoke of tyranny, and to reduce church and ſtate to what they were in 1648.

In the informatory vindication ſome expreſſions are acknowledged to be very exceptionable. Such as the attributing to the publiſhers of the Sanquhar declaration the title of a convention of eſtates; and, in other expreſſions ſeeming to appropriate authority to its own author; and, as to the matter of the declaration relating to their renouncing the authority that then was, enough has been ſaid already. There were ſeveral preſent at the publication of this in arms, when a copy of it was fixed to the market croſs. Mr James Renwick was employed in proclaiming this, but had no hand in drawing it up; otherways, ſays the Revd. Mr Shields, in ſome things it had been more conſiderately worded; for though he approved of the matter of it, and the reaſons given for diſowning the authority of the tyrant, yet he always confeſſed there were ſome expreſſions in it very unadviſed. It was here they burnt the teſt and the act of ſucceſſion.

When the news of this came to Edinburgh, the council on the 14th of January, wrote to the king an account of the declaration that had been publiſhed, and made an act for burning the Solemn League and Covenant, the declarations publiſhed at Rutherglen and Sanquhar, and this at Lanerk. This was done with great pomp. A large theatre was erected at the croſs, and ſome of the magiſtrates attended in their robes until theſe papers were burnt by the hangman; but it was taken particular notice of, that the baille of Edinburgh, who attended on this ſervice, and who gave the covenant into the hands of the executioner, had all his houſes in the parliament-cloſe, which were reckoned the moſt ſtately in Europe, ſoon after reduced to aſhes. Though all pains were taken to ſuppreſs the flames, yet they baffled every attempt, until thoſe houſes were laid in ruins.

The town of Lanerk was fined in 6000 merks for not hindering the declaration to be publiſhed there, though it was not in their power to prevent it, and the ſhire ſuffered exceedingly on this account; for major White was ordered to march thither with ſome forces, and, by the inſtructions he received, was impowered to get a liſt of all forfeited perſons, to inform himſelf of the haunts and lurking places of the rebels, as they were called, of all that received or harboured them, and particularly of thoſe concerned in the above declaration; to ſeize and apprehend them, to diſſipate conventicles, &c. Many other commiſſions of this kind were afterwards given.

On the 27th Claverhouſe was ſent into Galloway to execute military orders there; and, on the 30th, received a commiſſion, as ſheriff of Wigtown, to puniſh all diſorders, diſturbers of the peace, and church irregularities in Kirkudbright, Annandale, Wigtoun and Dumfries. There was likeways a proclamation iſſued for furniſhing the ſoldiers with corn, hay and ſtraw for ready money; but, as this was neither obſerved, nor the delinquents called to an account, the country was expoſed to no ſmall oppreſſion. The ſame powers were in a few days granted to major White and Meldrum in the ſhire of Lanerk, together with a juſticiary power againſt all below heritors, who had been in what they called rebellion. However, duke Hamilton had ſo much intereſt as to get theſe a little ſoftened. On the 31ſt the council wrote to the king, and moved that the juriſdictions of the late earl of Argyll might be for ever annexed to the crown.

The parliament which was to ſit in March, was adjourned to the 17th of April, and from that to November; and though in one of theſe proclamations the king was made to ſay, that he will not ſoon part with ſo loyal and dutiful a parliament, yet no parliament ſat any more during this reign. The miniſtry could carry on their deſigns without them.

In this month James Gray of Chryſtoun, venturing home to ſee his family, was, on a Sabbath evening, ſeized by a party of dragoons, and carried in priſoner to Glaſgow, and, after three or four weeks, to Edinburgh, where he lay a long time in jail, without being called before any court. After a year's impriſonment he was brought before the council, who attacked him with their enſnaring queſtions; but, becauſe he owned that the matter of the covenant was lawful, and its obligations binding, and adhered to the principle of ſelf defence upon juſt ground, and refuſed to ſubject himſelf to the preſent church eſtabliſhment, he was ſent back to priſon, where he lay more than two years. In the ear 1684, a ſentence of baniſhment was pronounced againſt him; and in Auguſt 1685, he was, without the leaſt previous notice, hurried from priſon, with about 140 more, and put aboard captain Love's ſhip, and was tranſported to Jamaica. They endured great hardſhips in their paſſage, by being crouded under the hatches, without having proviſion ſufficient for their ſupport, nor any refreſhment during the ſickneſs wherewith not a few of them were ſeized. Many died of thirſt. Some offered a crown for a draught of water, of which there was plenty, but were refuſed. After a three month's paſſage they were ſold at Jamaica. Mr Gray was old, being then near 60 years; and they who had the diſpoſal of him refuſing to part with him but for a large ſum, he was impriſoned and fell ſick. Being then apprehenſive of his death, rather than loſe all they thought proper to releaſe him, upon his paying 15 l. ſterling. He ſurvived his troubles, and died in his native country.

On the 20th William Harvey, weaver in Lanerk, was before the juſticiary, and indicted for being at the late rebellion, and at the publiſhing of the declaration. He was brought in guilty, and ordered to be hanged at Lanerk on the 3d of next month.

On the 22d the Revd. Mr Patrick Warner (after the revolution miniſter of Irvine) was apprehended in Edinburgh at he houſe of his mother-in-law Mrs Guthrie, by a party of the guards commanded by captain Maitland, joined with ſome of the town-company commanded by major Johnſtoun. They violently broke open the doors, ranſacked the houſe, pulled him out of his bed, and took with them upwards of 20 copies of Calderwood's hiſtory, lately printed, and moſtly at his own charges, with ſome hundreds of the Second Book of Diſcipline, and ſeveral other valuable books and manuſcripts; nay, they ſearched his pockets, and took what money they could find, together with his watch; but captain Maitland was ſo kind as to oblige them to reſtore the watch to Mrs Warner. Johnſtoun and his men carried off her wearing apparel and linen. The books and manuſcripts were taken to the council houſe, but were never returned. He was immediately carried to the Abby guard, where he continued till next morning.

The ſame night Mr William Livingſton, ſon to the Rev. Mr John Livingſton at Ancrum, was apprehended with all his papers; but after a month's impriſonment, was releaſed upon finding bail to appear when called. But;

Mr Warner met with ſeverer treatment. He had been licenſed 1669, and was ordained at London, with a view to be ſettled in the Eaſt-Indies. Accordingly he arrived there, and was about three years miniſter at Fort St. George upon the coaſt of Coromandel. He returned to Scotland about the year 1677, and preached in houſes and in the fields, as he had opportunity till Bothwell. Then he retired to Holland, where he continued till laſt year, when he

he came and married a daughter of the Rev. Mr William Guthrie. The day after he was apprehended he was carried up the ſtreet to the Parliament-cloſe, under a guard of a whole company of muſqueteers, as if he had been ſome notable malefactor, and brought before a committee of the council, where he was examined as to his preaching in the fields, the primate's death, the papers found about him, the Second Book of Diſcipline. They had nothing to lay to his charge but non-conformity. He was ſeveral times before them, and though they were at great pains to find a ſufficient accuſation, yet they laboured in vain. He continued in priſon, without receiving aliment, not for want of inclination, but matter.

During his impriſonment he lectured and preached twice every Lord's day to the priſoners, and ſome others, who, by the intereſt of friends or money could be admitted. After ſundry applications of his friends it was propoſed that he ſhould give bond not to preach any more unleſs he conformed, or remain perpetually in priſon, or leave the kingdom, and give bail not to return without permiſſion, under the penalty of 5000 merks. He choſe the laſt, and the council, on the 6th of June 1672, ordered him to be releaſed and depart the kingdom in 15 days. When that time was expired he went to Berwick, and continued for a little on the Engliſh ſide of the Tweed, till he could get his family removed; then he hired a ſmall houſe near the village called Spittle, where he preached ſometimes in his own and ſometimes in a neighbouring houſe. But his enemies in Scotland being vexed that he went no farther, procured an order from the king and Engliſh council for apprehending him, ſo that here began a new period of his ſufferings. Mr Warner being apprehenſive of danger, found it neceſſary to retire farther into England, and at laſt took a houſe in Newcaſtle, whither he brought his family.

By this time colonel Struthers had repeated orders to ſeize him; and accordingly he was apprehended at a friend's houſe and carried that night to a private houſe five or ſix miles diſtant, and kept priſoner there. Mean while ſome of them, pretending to inform his wife and bring him linen, &c. went and rifled his houſe, and took with them what papers they could find. Next day he and his papers were brought to col. Struthers, who was a juſtice of peace. Mr Warner ſhewed him the act by which he was releaſed and baniſhed from Scotland, and civily aſked him what he had to lay to his charge ſince he came to England, and at the ſame time aſſured him he had never returned into Scotland ſince that time.

The colonel being ſurpriſed, called for him next day, and aſked him if he was willing to take the oath of allegiance. Mr Warner deſired time to conſider of it. Upon this he was committed to Newcaſtle jail, his mittimus only bearing that he had refuſed to take the oath of allegiance. He continued here ſeven or eight weeks, till the ſitting of the aſſizes. Being informed that the ſaid oath would be put to him, he reſolved to take it if he found that there was nothing of the ſupremacy in it.

When called before the court, he humbly deſired to be ſatisfied in a few things, which the judge permitting, he aſked, 1. 'Whether this oath did bind him to allegiance to the king's ſucceſſor de facto, as well as de jure?' The judge anſwered, It did not. 2. Whereas the oath binds him to be obedient to the king and laws, he deſired to be ſatisfied, 'Whether in caſe of any of the laws ſhould be ſuch as he could not in conſcience give active obedience to, he was bound by this oath, any farther than either to obey or ſuffer according to law?' The judge declared he was bound no farther. 3. Since he was a ſtranger in England, and perhaps might in a little time remove elſe where, he deſired to know, 'Whether he was, by the oath offered juſt now, bound to give the obedience formerly mentioned any longer than he was in England, ſeeing, when he comes to live in another nation or kingdom, it may be ſuppoſed he muſt be obedient to the laws thereof, and yet thoſe, in ſeveral things may be different from thoſe in England?' The judge told him his obedience was no longer due than while he continued in England. He took the oath upon theſe terms, and was releaſed.

The reader cannot but obſerve, that though matters were very bad in England at this time, yet tyranny and oppreſſion were not arrived at that height as they were by our prelatical managers in Scotland; for here Mr Warner was allowed to propoſe his ſcruples in open court concerning the oath of allegiance; but in Scotland a noble peer was condemned to die only for offering an explanation of the ſelf contradictory teſt. Mr Warner's charges by his jail fees, the loſs of his books and papers, &c. were upwards of 100 l. ſterl. He retired ſoon after to Roterdam, where he continued till 1687, when he returned to his native country, and was very uſeful in the church of Scotland for many years after the revolution.

From what Mr Warner ſuffered, one may form a judgment of the ſufferings of many others in this period, of whom my author could give no account, ſuch as profeſſor George Campbell of Edinburgh, Mr Thomas Hog at Kiltearn in the ſhire of Roſs, Mr James Veitch at Mauchlin, Mr Alex. Pitcairn at Dron, Mr James Kirktoun after the revolution miniſter at Edinburgh, Mr A. Haſty at Glaſgow, Mr Robert Langlands, firſt at the Barony church in Glaſgow, and then at Elgin in Murry, Mr William Archibald, Mr Jo. Harroway, Mr Pat. Cooper and others, who were refugees in Holand. This was alſo the caſe of ſeveral noblemen and gentlemen, as the earl of Loudon, lord Strathnaver, afterwards earl of Sutherland, and lord Stair.

On the 23d of February, the council conſidering that ſeveral of the clergy in the dioceſe of Aberdeen had taken the teſt, paſſed an act allowing them to return to their charges, and enjoy the profits and emoluments of the ſame, as Mr John Menzies profeſſor of divinity in the Mariſchal college, Mr Pat. Simpſon, and Mr. Will. Blair miniſters of the ſaid burgh, Mr Ja. Garden profeſſor of divinity in Old Aberdeen, Mr Geo. Anderſon in Mortlich, Mr Jo. Barclay in Cruden, Mr Jo. Corkbrien at Old-Deer, and Mr Pat. Innes at Bamff, Mr Robert Irvine at Towie, and ſeveral others of the recuſant clergy, getting the better of their ſcruples were admitted to take the teſt.

On the 3d of March William Harvey was executed at Lanerk. He had liberty to deliver his laſt words, though the drums were ready to beat. He declared himſelf a Preſbyterian, and that, in his judgment, people ſhould obey the king in his lawful authority. He likewiſe declared that he believed the Scripture, the Confeſſion of Faith and Catechiſms, adhered to the Covenants and all the faithful teſtimonies ſince 1660, and that he was for kingly government according to God's word. He died with much compoſure. And though he was made a ſacrifice to the Lanerk declaration, yet it does not appear that he had any concern in that, but only in proclaiming the weſt country declaration before Bothwell.

A few days after this the council, being informed of ſome conventicles, gave proper orders for puniſhing the perſons guilty with the utmoſt ſeverity of the law.

Mean while the duke of York, having ſignified his intention of going to England to meet the king at Newmarket, required Queenſberry to follow him, in order to lay before his majeſty the ſtate of the treaſury; and ſays biſhop Burnet, 'at parting he recommended to the council to preſerve the public peace, to ſupport the church, and oblige all men to live regularly in obedience to the laws.'

The biſhops made their court to him with ſo much zeal, that they wrote a letter to the archbiſhop of Canterburry, to be communicated to the reſt of the Engliſh biſhops, ſetting forth in a very high ſtrain his affection to the church and his care of it; and leaſt this piece of merit had been ſlifled by Standcroft, they ſent a copy of it to the preſs, which was a greater reproach to them than ſervice to the duke, who could not but deſpiſe ſuch abject and indecent flattery. My author, ſays biſhop Peterſon, went up with the duke, and probably carried the letter, which was as follows.

March 9th 1682.

May it pleaſe your grace.

HIS royal highneſs having paſſed from hence on Monday laſt, being called by the king to attend his majeſty at New market, we ſhould prove very defective in duty and gratitude, if upon this occaſion, we ſhould ſhould forget to acknowlege to your grace, how much this poor church and our order do owe to his princely care and goodneſs, that his majeſty and the worthy biſhops of England may from you receive the juſt account thereof. Since his royal highneſs's coming to this kingdom, we find our caſe much changed to the better, and our church and order, which through the cunning and power of their adverſaries, were expoſed to extreme hazard and contempt, ſenſibly relieved and reſcued; which, next to the watchful providence of God, that mercifully ſuperintends his church, we can aſcribe to nothing ſo much as to his royal highneſs's gracious owning and vigilant protection of us. Upon all occaſions, he gives freſh inſtances of his eminent zeal againſt the moſt unreaſonable ſchiſm, which, by rending, threatens the ſubverſion of our church and religion, and concerns himſelf, as a patron to us, in all our public and even perſonal intereſts; ſo that all men take notice of his ſignal kindneſs to us and obſerve, that he looks on the enemies of the church, as adverſaries to the monarchy itſelf; nor did we ever propoſe or offer to his royal highneſs any rational expedient, which might conduce for relief or ſecurity of the church, which he did not readily embrace and effectuate. The peace and tranquillity of this kingdom is the effect of his prudent and ſteady conduct of affairs, and the humours of our wicked fanatics are much reſtrained from dangerous eruptions, upon their apprehenſions of his vigilance and juſtice; for they dread nothing ſo much as to ſee him upon the head of his majeſty's councils and forces againſt them. We hope your grace will make our dutiful acknowlegments to his royal highneſs, for all his princely favours to us, and give him the moſt fervent aſſurance of our ſincere endeavours to ſerve him, and of our moſt fervent prayers for his temporal and eternal happineſs, as the bound duty of us. May it pleaſe your grace, your grace's moſt humble, &c.' This famous letter was ſubſcribed by the archbiſhops of St Andrews and Glaſgow, the biſhops of Edinburgh, Dunkeld, Galloway, Brechin and Dumblain, and was publiſhed at London on the 28th of April. When the duke was gone, the counſellors were ordered to ſtay at Edinburgh till his return. On the 21ſt lord Livingſtone and the marquis of Athol were impowered to act againſt conventicles, and had ſoldiers to aſſiſt them, as was likewiſe the earl of Linlithgow on the 30th. On the 27th, Chriſtian Fife, a poor illiterate woman, was proſecuted before the juſticiary for high-treaſon, for beating one Mr Ramſay in the Old kirk of Edinburgh, and declaring that ſhe thought the king no lawful king, &c. She was ſentenced to be hanged on the 7th of April, which was done accordingly.

On the 4th of April Thomas Greg merchant in Carrick, travelling with his pack, was ſeized by Claver-houſe, and, after his money and goods were taken from him, was carried firſt to Newtoun in Galloway, and next to Dumfries, where he was impriſoned, and had been ſtarved to death had it not been for the charitable ſupplies of good people. After eleven days impriſonment, without any trial or ſentence, he and ſundry others were put aboard a ſhip at Leith bound for Holland, and gifted as recruits there.

On the 7th Robert Fleming of Auchinlin, Hugh Macllwraith of Auchinfloor, major Joſeph Learmont and Robert MacClelland of Barſcob, who, with ſeveral others, had been forfeited in life and fortune, having been apprehended, were brought before the juſticiary, and without any farther trial, ordered to be executed at the Graſs-market of Edinburgh on Wedneſday the 12; but it ſeems all of them got off through intereſt. Barſcob made ſome compliances, and was of uſe to the managers afterwards.

On the 23d the Rev. Mr Henry Erſkine was apprehended, when at family-worſhip, by Meldrum with a party of ſoldiers, and ſent priſoner to Melroſs. Next day his nephew James Erſkine of Sheilfield became bail for his appearance, when called, in the ſum of 5000 merks. He was ordained miniſter at Cornhill in the north of England about 1649, and was ejected by the act of uniformity. He afterwards returned to Scotland, where he preached, ſometimes in the fields, and frequently in his own houſe, till September laſt year, when he was rendered incapable of preaching or praying by a violent indiſpoſition of body. Meldrum, on the 8th of May, called for him and his bail, and having given up the bond, carried him priſoner to Jedburgh, where he was a ſecond time releaſed, upon bail to appear at Edinburgh on the 12th.

Mean while the duke of York arrived on the 8th, and immediately told the council, That it was his majeſty's pleaſure the lord preſident, afterwards earl of Aberdeen, be chancellor, Queenſberry treaſurer, and the earl of Perth juſtice general. This laſt, who ſoon after turned papiſt, being now at the head of the criminal court, the ſufferers could expect no favour, and their reaſons for continuing to diſown the then authority could not but be ſtrengthened.

The duke was ſhipwrecked on his return. He and ſeveral more were ſaved in the boat; but the earl of Roxburgh, the laird of Hopeton, Sir Joſeph Douglas, the lord Obrian, with the duke's brother-in-law Mr Hyde, and ſeveral others, were loſt. Biſhop Burnet tells us, 'That, as he was going back to bring the duchеſs, the Gloceſter frigate that carried him ſtruck on a bank of ſand. The duke got into a boat, and took care of his dogs, and ſome unknown perſons, who were ſuppoſed, from that earneſt care of his, to be prieſts. The long-boat went off with very few in her, though ſhe might have carried conſiderably more than ſhe did. 150 perſons periſhed, ſome of them men of great quality. But the duke took no notice of this cruel neglect, which was chiefly laid to Leg's charge.

On the 12th Mr Henry Erſkine, notwithſtanding of his being ſeized with an ague, came to Edinburgh, and was brought before a committee of the council, where, after ſome previous examination, the advocate aſked him if he would bind himſelf to preach no more at conventicles. 'He anſwered, my lord, I have my commiſſion from Chriſt, and, though I were within an hour of my death, I durſt not lay it down at any mortal man's foot.' His affair was delayed till the ſixth of June.

Mean while on the 15th of May, the duke and duchеſs of York ſet out for England, whither he could now repair with eaſe, when the patrons of liberty, were ſuppreſſed, and the vileſt men were exalted.

On the 17th one Robert Gray an Engliſhman, and conſequently none of their ſubjects, having been apprehended about ten months before, upon what pretence is not known, was before the juſticiary. They had nothing to lay to his charge when he was ſeized. But ſome time laſt month he wrote a letter from priſon, in anſwer to one he had received from John Anderſon, wherein he approved of what had been done in caſting off the tyranny; and called the oath, appointed by the laſt parliament, the black teſt. He owned the letter, and the expreſſion in it to be his opinion, and for this was condemned to be hanged in the Graſs-market of Edinburgh on the 19th, which was executed accordingly. His teſtimony is in the Cloud of Witneſſes, wherein he juſtly obſerves, that they were unjuſtly taking away his life merely for adhering to his principles, and had no matter of fact to prove againſt him, &c.

When he was brought to the council-houſe, and deſired to purge the city of blood, he told them that judgment would overtake the city for the innocent blood that had been ſhed there. At the place of execution he ſung Pſal. lxxxiv. and read John xv. and, after he had prayed, went up the ladder, and, looking about to the multitude, ſaid, 'Sirs, you are feeding your eyes upon me, but what ſee ye upon me? Surely you ſee not the wrath of God upon me: but, if ye would look up to the heavens, you might ſee the wrath of an angry God againſt yourſelves. —I am brought out of another nation to own that covenant which ye have broken.—Glory, glory, glory be to his name, that ever he gave me a life to lay down for him, in witneſſing againſt his enemies, and the wrongs done to my Lord and Maſter Jeſus Chriſt.—As for you who are the remnant of the Lord's people,—keep your ground, and beware of turning aſide to one hand or another; and I will aſſure you the Lord will prepare a Zoar for you. Cleave to truth and to one another, and, as ſure as God lives, ye ſhall ſee yet glorious days in Scotland; for I die in the faith of it, that he is on his way returning to the land; but wo! wo! wo! will be to thoſe who are enemies and ſtrangers to him.' After he had prayed a little within himſelf, he was turned over.

The day after this execution the council, in conſequence of what the duke of York recommended to them at his departure, gave inſtructions to general Dalziel to march with ſome ſoldiers to the ſhires of Lanerk and Ayr, and to ſend the laird of Meldrum, and what officers he ſhould judge proper, to the ſhires of Roxburgh, Selkirk and Berwick.

The general's inſtructions were very extenſive. He was, among other things, to hear and conſider what propoſals duke Hamilton and the other commiſſioners of the ſhire would make for ſecuring the peace of it for the future,—to call for a liſt of ſuch rebels as had not yet ſubmitted, to hear what ſubmiſſion any of them would make, to think upon proper methods for apprehending any of them, or of any vagrant preachers, and for making perſons, both innocent and guilty, keep their pariſh churches, &c. The general and thoſe commiſſioned by him obeyed theſe inſtructions.

On the 29th the council, having information of a riot in the pariſh of Dron upon Mr Drummond, ordered a company of foot under captain Maitland to quarter on the pariſh, and to receive orders from the marquis of Athol, and apprehend thoſe concerned in it, eſpecially Mr Alexander Pitcairn and his beadle, who were reputed to have promoted it. Some priſoners were upon this afterwards ſent in to Edinburgh, and the marquis of Athol had thanks for his diligence.

On the 6th of June Mr Henry Erſkine was indicted before the council for preaching at conventicles, diſorderly marriages and baptiſms. He denied the whole, and pleaded his indiſpoſition ſince 1681. But, becauſe he would not ſwear againſt himſelf, he was ſentenced to pay 5000 merks fine, to go that night to the priſon at Edinburgh, and next day to the Baſs till the fine was paid. Mr John Linlithgow of Redpath was proſecuted with him, and received the ſame ſentence. But what was the conſequence with reſpect to him my author does not know. Mr Erſkine, through the intereſt of ſome friends, eſcaped going to the Baſs, and was allowed to depart out of the kingdom. He retired to the north of England, where he lived ſomewhat at eaſe for two years and a half. Then he was apprehended, and was for ſome time a priſoner. After he was releaſed he continued preaching every Lord's day at Monnilaus till 1687, when he returned to Scotland, and kept a meeting houſe till the revolution, when he was called to be a miniſter at Churnſide, where he died 1696.

On the 8th of June the council gave a commiſſion to Andrew Atchiſon writer in Edinburgh, under the direction of the lord Montgomery, Sir Archibald Stuart of Blackhall, &c. to proceed againſt perſons guilty of church diſorders in the ſhire of Renfrew, and for apprehending rebels, vagrant preachers, or the harbourers of them, &c. The officers of the army were commanded to aſſiſt in proſecuting the ends of this commiſſion.

Next day the following miniſters were outlawed, viz. Meſſ. James Rymer, Robert Gilleſpie, Thomas Arnot, John Harroway, John Ferguſon, John Gilleſpie and John Moncrief.

The ſame day Mr Thomas Archer, who had ſince July laſt year been in priſon for non-conformity, was releaſed. While in the Canongate jail he is ſaid to have made himſelf maſter of the Hebrew, Chaldaic, Syriac, and ſome other oriental languages. He went over to Holland, and improved himſelf in all the valuable branches of literature, and was there ordained by Mr Fleming and other Scots preſbyterian miniſters then at Roterdam. We ſhall hear more of him afterwards, when he came over with Argyll.

The council, on this 9th of June, authoriſed duke Hamilton, and others, to grant ſafe conduct to ſuch of the reputed rebels as petitioned for it under a becoming ſenſe of their rebellion, and upon ſignifying their reſolution to live regularly for the future. This commiſſion was to continue only to the 3d of Auguſt. It was afterwards lengthened out to the 15th, and then to the 6th of September. Some petitions were preſented, and the petitioners allowed to come in before the council. But few who were concerned in Bothwell took the benefit of this becauſe the teſt was impoſed on all who came before the council.

On the 15th the ſocieties united for correſpondence had their general quarterly meeting at Tala lin in the pariſh of Tweedſmuir in the ſhire of Peebles, and uſed their utmoſt endeavours againſt the errors of James Ruſſel and others, who had run into the extravagancies of John Gib. The curate of the pariſh acquainted the council with this meeting, which gave riſe to a moſt virulent proclamation. Some of them it ſeems were in arms, but their number was ſmall, not near to what they were repreſented in the proclamation I ſhall juſt now give an abſtract.

Mean while, on the 7th of July, one Robert Nairn, in the pariſh of Bonhill, was brought under a ſeries of troubles. The fine which was laid upon him ſome time laſt year was now exacted. He was forced to quit his employment, leave his houſe and family, and diſmiſs his ſervants. His houſe was frequently rifled.

About this time John Bredin in the ſame pariſh, John Flockhart in the Hole of Kippen, and Thomas Thomſon in Eaſter Couchland, were, for mere non conformity, harraſſed by the oppreſſions of fines, quarterings, and the like.

The council, on the 8th of July, publiſhed a moſt ſevere proclamation in the king's name, ſetting forth, That of late, ſome traitors, runnagadoes and fugitives had aſſembled, about the number of 80, with forbidden weapons, and in an unlawful manner, near to Tala lin in the ſhire of Peebles; and that the people of that country had been ſo deficient in their duty as not to give timely notice of ſuch meetings either to the council or ſheriff of the ſhire; and therefore they commanded all the ſubjects in town and country throughout the kingdom, upon knowlege or information that any number of men meet unlawfully in arms, or appear in company in any place, or where any one or two of ſuch as are declared traitors or fugitives ſhall repair, that they preſently give intimation of it to the chancellor, or ſuch of the council as ſhall be at Edinburgh for the time, or to any commander of the forces that ſhall be neareſt, and to the ſheriff of the ſhire, ſtewart of the ſtewartry, &c. where the ſaid meeting or perſons appear, or are informed to be, and that within the ſpace of one hour at moſt for every three miles diſtance they are at the time from Edinburgh, or from the neareſt commander of the forces, ſheriff or other magiſtrates. Upon this information all ſheriffs, magiſtrates, &c. were required to aſſemble a ſufficient number of the ſubjects, with whom they were to ſearch for and apprehend ſuch perſons, and purſue them till they are apprehended or expelled out of their juriſdictions, and, upon their flight, to acquaint the magiſtrates of the next ſhire, who are required to do the ſame, and ſo from ſhire to ſhire till they were expelled the kingdom. And whoever were refractory, were required, to be treated as being art and part with them.

The proclamation, of which this is but a ſhort abſtract, ſpeaks for itſelf, and ſufficiently ſhews the ſpirit of the managers. The ſociety meetings were held with the utmoſt ſecrecy. The occaſion and deſign of them we have already ſhewn; but now the proclamation for the Hue and Cry, as it was called, was publiſhed, which, could not but expoſe the poor wanderers to the greateſt oppreſſion and calamities. When the adminiſtration was in ſuch hands we need not wonder though things ſtill grew worſe and worſe; for they next granted not only a council-power, but alſo a juſticiary-power to ſome officers of the army, and others of deſperate fortunes and ill morals.

Accordingly, on the third of Auguſt, the council, conſidering how remiſs magiſtrates were in puniſhing thoſe that kept conventicles, withdrew from ordinances, &c. and in ſuffering thoſe in the late rebellion to live in quiet, &c. ordered a commiſſion to be given to major White, and the laird of Meldrum, to meet and confer with ſheriffs, bailies of regalities, and other magiſtrates, and call before them, when and where they ſhall think proper, all perſons, whether in town or country, whether heritors, tenants, or others, guilty or ſuſpected to be guilty of withdrawing from ordinances, &c. ſince the indemnity 1679, to hold courts, to pronounce ſentence, and order the ſame to be executed upon the guilty. And, if the magiſtrates ſhould refuſe to concur, the ſaid commiſſioners had power to act by themſelves, and to call the magiſtrates in the ſhires under their juriſdictions to account for their diligence againſt the perſons guilty of the ſaid diſorders. The commiſſioners were alſo impowered to inform themſelves of thoſe who were in the late rebellion, and yet lived in their bounds, and enjoyed their rents and moveables, that they might take an inventary of them, to ſequeſter them for his majeſty's uſe, and purſue and apprehend the rebels themſelves, and the harbourers of them, in order to their being brought to juſtice. They likewiſe ordered a juſticiary power to the ſaid major White and the laird of Meldrum, with authority to call before them any of the late rebels, not being heritors, to bring them to a trial, and paſs ſentence upon them, as they ſhall be brought in innocent or guilty.

By this act it is very plain, that the executive power was taken out of the hands of inferior magiſtrates, and put into thoſe of their own creatures; and the officers of the army had now the power of life and death. In conſequence of this act, divers kinds of commiſſions were granted, which I ſhall not here inſert. White and Meldrum received their commiſſions in the terms of the act. Commiſſions of the ſame nature were, about the end of the year, granted to Crawford of Ardmillan, the earl of Linlithgow, John Skene of Hallyards and Kenneth MacKenzie of Siddie, which laſt was for the northern ſhires of Roſs and Cromarty.

The ſame day Thomas Lauchlan, who was one of thoſe forfeited, and ordered for execution when apprehended, was before the juſticiary; and on the 13th, was ordered to be hanged at the Graſs-market of Edinburgh on the 16th.

On the 29th of September the advocate was ordered to proſecute one Mr Robert Kennedy for being in the rebellion 1679, and for field conventicles ſince the indemnity; but the iſſue is not known.

On the 20th of October the earl of Middelton was made conjunct ſecretary with the earl of Moray; ſo that by the alterations which were made, many of the duke's creatures had the management of affairs put into their hands.

Some time this month James Robertſon in Stonehouſe in the ſhire of Lanerk, who uſually travelled with a pack coming to Kilmarnock, went to ſee an acquaintance who was in priſon there. While with him, without the leaſt offence or provocation, his pack and goods were taken from him, and himſelf carried to the guard houſe, where he was kept cloſe priſoner for 10 or 12 days. During which time he was brought before major White, and refuſing to give his oath ſuper inquirendis, was moſt barbarouſly treated. The major pulled him by the noſe, and wrung it till the blood guſhed out. A fit perſon this to be veſted with juſticiary power! Then he was ſent to priſon; and, when he and his fellow priſoner offered to worſhip God, the captain of the guard came with fury pulled the Bible out of his hand, and ſwore he would burn it if they offered to be thus engaged. After a few weeks he was carried to Edinburgh. At Linlithgow he was preſſed to drink the king's health, and, upon refuſing, the ſoldiers treated him with the utmoſt rudeneſs, by tying his head and feet together, and leaving him all night in that poſture. Next day he was carried to Edinburgh with his feet tyed under the horſe's belly, and in December next was put to a violent death, as ſhall be related in its proper place.

On the 15th of November Alexander Hume portioner of Hume was indicted before the lords of juſticiary for riſing in rebellion againſt the king, marching up and down in arms, rendezvouſing with the rebels in Bewlyedge, &c. But, as there was no proof againſt him, the lords dropt the proceſs. Nevertheleſs, becauſe he could not take the teſt, he was kept in priſon till the 20th of December when he was again indicted by the advocate.

Mean while, on the 16th, dame Katharine Rig lady Cavers appeared before the council for being preſent at conventicles ſince 1679, and for having heard Meſſ. Cargill, Arnot and Semple, declared traitors, and Thomas Douglas, Archibald Riddel and James Oſburn. They had no proof; but, becauſe ſhe would not ſwear againſt herſelf, they fined her in 500 l. ſterling, and ſent her to priſon till ſhe paid it, and found bail to be preſent at no conventicles. She continued a priſoner in Stirling-caſtle till the end of the year 1684.

On the 11th of December James Robertſon before mentioned, with William Cochran in Carnduff, and John Finlay in the pariſh of Kilmarnock were indicted before the juſticiary for high-treaſon. Their indictment was founded on the anſwers they gave at their previous examination, for no matters of fact were laid to their charge.

The examination of James Robertſon before a committee of the council, was as follows: Q. Is the king your lawful prince, yea, or not? A. Since ye make your queſtions matters of life and death, ye ought to give time to deliberate upon them; but ſeeing I am put to it, I anſwer, 'As he is a terror to evil doers, and a praiſe to them that do well,' he is, or he is not. Q. Were Pentland and Bothwell acts of traitory? A. They being in their own defence, and the defence of the goſpel, they were not acts of traitory and rebellion, ſelf-defence being always lawful, which I prove from the Confeſſion of Faith, whereon you ground yourſelves in that article, which is, That ſubjects may reſiſt unjuſt violence and tyranny. Q. Wherein lies his tyranny? A. If robbing the privileges of the church be not an act of tyranny, I refer to be judged. Q. Is the king a tyrant? A. I refer to his obligation in the coronation oath, and his preſent actings and practices, in robbing the privileges of the goſpel, with the uſurpation of the church's liberties and the prerogatives royal of Jeſus Chriſt the Anointed of the Father, in making himſelf ſupreme; and I refer it to perſons at home, and nations abroad. Q. Was you at Bothwellbridge? A. Ye count it an act of traitory, and alſo rebellion; bear witneſs of it, and ſo make it evident. Q. Purge yourſelf by oath, ſo we offer to ſet you at liberty. A. I will ſay no more of it, for when I told the truth to ſome of you, it was not believed. One of them ſaid, Q. Now, I will try if you are a man of parts: there was an act of parliament, when the Confeſſion of Faith was made, declaring that the king was ſupreme, and it was owned by the preſbyterians at that time. A. How could that be owned, ſeeing the Confeſſion itſelf was owned? Shew me the act. But it was not produced. Q. Was the biſhop's death murder? A. When I am a judge, ſet on the bench, I ſhall paſs ſentence thereupon. Q. Own you the Lanerk and Sanquhar declarations? A. I cannot own any thing till I ſee and conſider it. Q. Do you keep your pariſh kirk? A. If the miniſter has ought to challenge me with, let him do it. Q. Now, as a teſt of your loyalty, will you ſay, God ſave the king? A. Prayer ought to be gone about with compoſure and deliberation, and I am not in a compoſure for it. Q. Would you ſeek a bleſſing if at meat? A. If you were preſent you would ſee. Then one of them ſaid, Theſe principles will condemn you. He anſwered, If I be abſolved of God, it is the leſs matter though men condemn me. The examination of William Cochran and John Finlay, and their anſwers, were much to the ſame purpoſe. All the three owned their anſwers before the criminal court: and, though no other proof was againſt them, they were condemned to be hanged at the Graſs-market on Friday the 15th of December.

When James Robertſon offered to ſpeak on the ſcaffold, he was interrupted by the drums; and, complaining of this, Johnſtoun the town-major beat him with his cane. This unprecedented cruelty to a dying man, together with the patience and cheerfulneſs of the martyr, convinced ſome of the ſpectators of the vileneſs of prelacy and perſecution. And ſeveral told my author, that they dated their firſt ſerious impreſſions at the execution of theſe martyrs of Jeſus. In his laſt teſtimony he ſpeaks thus concerning his declining to ſay God ſave the king. 'The refuſing to ſay God ſave the king, which we find was the order that was uſed in and among the children of Iſrael at the king's anointing to that office, and uſed in our own nation at the coronation. Now this, being only due to a lawful king, ought not to be given but to a lawful king, and ſo not to him being a degenerate tyrant; for if I ſhould, I thereby had ſaid amen to all that he hath done againſt the church and liberties thereof, and to all his oppreſſion, preſſion, by unlawful exactions and raiſing of armies for no other effect but to deprive us of hearing the goſpel, and troubling and moleſting the ſubjects both in their conſciences and external liberties, and alſo to the bloodſhed and murders upon the people of God, and free ſubjects of the kingdom, and to bid him God ſpeed, contrary to 2d epiſtle of John, ver. 10. And ſeeing it cannot be given to any that have thus uſed their power to a wrong end, and ſo much leſs when they have ſet him up as an idol in the room of God incarnate. And ſhall I pray to bleſs that man in his perſon and government, which God hath curſed; for it cannot be expected but that he ſhall be curſed that thus ventureth on the boſſes of the buckler of God almighty.'

William Cochran, in his laſt teſtimony upon the ſame point, has theſe words: 'Now, the main article of my indictment, upon which I have received my ſentence of death from men, was, that I would not ſay God ſave the king, which (as they have now ſtated him an idol in the Mediator's room) I could not do, without being guilty of ſaying amen to all that he hath done againſt the church and people of God, and true ſubjects of the kingdom, and the ancient and fundamental laws thereof; and have done contrary to 2d epiſt. John, ver. 10.—And alſo, ye know, that the taking the name of God in our mouths is a part of worſhip, and ſo a worſhipping of their idol; for, before our faces they ſay, That he was king over all perſons, and over all cauſes, which is a putting him in God's room.'

Now, the prelatical pamphleteers mightily extol the clemency of this period, in being willing to pardon criminals, if they would only ſay God ſave the king, and exclaim againſt the obſtinacy of thoſe who would not comply with ſuch eaſy terms; but I have laid before the reader their own reaſons, in their own words, and he is to judge, whether it was not conſcience, rather than obſtinacy, that kept them from yielding to this. If they complied, they muſt either be ſerious in ſpeaking the words or not. If they were not, they knew it was a taking God's name in vain; and if they were ſerious, then they judged that thereby they approved of all that was done. But, not to detain the reader farther on this point, theſe three godly men were executed according to their ſentence.

On the 11th of December, — Hay of Arrioland, Al. Hunter of Colquhaſſen, And. Martin of Little Ellies, Jam. Welſh of Little Cloudon, MacCulloch of Barholm, Gordon ſecond ſon of the deceaſed laird of Holm, Meſſ. Samuel Arnot and Thomas Warner miniſters, Haliday of Mayfield, Will. Thomſon younger of Moncraig, Kennedy younger of Knockhallonie, Alex. MacNaught younger of Overtoun, Thomas Crichton of Hole of Balwhaſſie, John Brown ſmith and heritor of Newton, were, in abſence, declared rebels, and outlawed, and their goods and chattles forfeited. But this ſentence was thought too mild, for the managers wanted to finger their eſtates; and therefore, on the 18th, all the above mentioned gentlemen, except Moncraig and Knockhallonie, together with William Grierſon of Kolchquher were ordered, upon their being apprehended, to be executed as traitors, when and where the lords ſhould appoint. However, it does not appear that any of them were executed. Alex. MacKie of Drumboy and Ant. Mackie of Glencard, being then priſoners, were ſentenced to be executed at the croſs of Edinburgh, the firſt Wedneſday of July next, but it ſeems providence interpoſed in their behalf.

Mean time Alex. Hume of Hume became a ſacrifice to prelatical rage; for though nothing worthy of death or bond was found againſt him, yet he was a ſecond time indicted before the lords of juſticiary on the 20th of December; but, though the witneſſes did not agree, and the whole of the evidence was lame, yet he was brought in guilty of high treaſon, and condemned to be hanged at the croſs of Edinburgh on Friday the 29th. The day was haſtened to prevent any application to be made to the king in his behalf. And though his friends, fearing what would come, made intereſt, ſo that a pardon came down ſome days before the execution, yet the earl of Perth kept it up. Mrs Hume begged the lady Perth, the morning of her huſband's execution, to intercede for his life on account of her five ſmall children; but her ladyſhip, throwing off all the tenderneſs of her ſex, anſwered her in language which my author did not chuſe to inſert. I ſhall only obſerve, that the reader may here ſee, that not only thoſe who renounced the king's authority, but even thoſe that had not as yet clearneſs to take that ſtep, became a prey to the perſecutors, when they had a mind to vent their rage. Mr Hume's laſt words on the ſcaffold expreſſed the ſpirit of Chriſtianity as much as any of the martyrs; and, among other things, he ſaid,—'I am come here to lay down my life, and I bleſs the Lord I am not to lay it down as an evil doer; for though I be a ſinful man, as others are by nature, yet, through his grace, I hope I am planted in Chriſt Jeſus.—The world repreſents me as ſeditious and diſloyal, but God is my witneſs, and my own conſcience, of my innocency in this matter. I am loyal, and did ever judge obedience unto lawful authority my duty, and the duty of all Chriſtians.—But all a Chriſtian doth muſt be with faith; for what claſheth with the command of God cannot be our duty; and I pray the Lord may help the king to do his duty to the people, and people to do their duty to the king.' He declared his adherence to the covenants and works of reformation, his fears of judgments coming on the land, his own aſſurance of his future happineſs, forgave all his enemies, and all who had a hand in his death, took his farewel of all creature enjoyments, committing his wife and children to the care and protection of heaven, and his own ſpirit into the hands of Jeſus; and, juſt before he was turned off, concluded his life by ſinging Pſalm xvii. laſt verſe. His wife and children endured many hardſhips after this, but God ſupported them under, and brought them out of their troubles at the revolution.

The various commiſſions, of which we have ſpoken, and other things, together with the malicious activity of the curates, were the occaſion of the moſt unaccountable oppreſſions in almoſt all parts of the country; inſomuch, that, were all the particular inſtances to be mentioned, they would fill a volume by themſelves. Soldiers were ſent to the different ſhires where the commiſſioners were to act, and committed unheard of cruelties with impunity. Several had commiſſions, as the laird of Lagg and others, beſides thoſe mentioned above, and all were executed with rigour. I cannot, however, but give the reader a few inſtances:

In the pariſh of Twinham ſeveral country women, with ſucking children at their breaſts, were impriſoned by David Graham, becauſe they would not oblige themſelves to keep their pariſh-church and hear the incumbent. In the pariſh of Tunnergarth huſbands were forced, either to oblige themſelves to bring their wives to church, or not to harbour them; and ſuch was the piety of the curate of that pariſh, that, if any preſumed to meet together for prayer, he threatened to inform againſt them as a conventicle; and having notice of ſome of the perſons concerned in this dreadful irregularity, he ſent ſoldiers to their houſes. In the pariſh of St Mungo in Annandale, becauſe a boy of 16 years of age did not appear at one of their military courts. Cornet Graham ſent a party of ſoldiers to quarter on his father who kept the church regularly; for the curate ſaid, in that infamous court, that it was but fit the father ſhould be puniſhed for the child, whom he ought to have made regular by a bridle. And many parents were thus ſerved, while the papiſts were wholly overlooked, though maſs was openly ſaid; but theſe were the good friends of the royal brother and his creatures!

The ſame courſe was taken in Galloway, where multitudes of non-conformiſts were attacked by Claverhouſe, though none of them were concerned in any riſing. In the pariſh of New Glenluce he ſeized John Archbald, Ant. MacBridge, John MacCleanochan and John Wallace, for not hearing the incumbent. They were not only kept above 12 weeks in priſon, but alſo ſoldiers were ſent to their houſes to quarter in their families and eat up all their living. Then Claverhouſe ordered them to be tied two and two, and ſet on bare backed horſes, and be carried to Edinburgh; but, when they were gone a day's journey, he ſent a ſervant after them, and obliged them to purchaſe their liberty, by giving each a bond for 1000 merks. This ſame year James Harris of Ardmenoch and and his ſon John were impriſoned at Dumfries, by capt. Strachan, for not hearing the incumbent, and kept there till they paid 186 l. Scots, beſides 30 s. ſterl. to the jailors.

Major White and Ardmillan dreadfully haraſſed the ſhire of Ayr. John Boyd ſchoolmaſter in Cowend, for not hearing the incumbent, was forced to pay 40 l. Scots to Ardmillan, had his houſe pillaged, and himſelf ſent to priſon at Edinburgh. The major went through almoſt all the pariſhes in this ſhire, held courts, fined the non-conformiſts, and impriſoned not a few. The incumbents were the principal informers. He generally forced all, where ever he came, to oblige themſelves, wives, children, and ſervants, to keep the church, to abandon conventicles, &c. under the penalty of 100 merks; ſo that great ſums of money were, by this means, extorted from the poor country. In the pariſh of Dalmellingtoun the following perſons were fined at one of his courts, Roger Dun 100 merks, and 30 l. to Drumſuy, becauſe the fine was ſo ſmall. John Edgar 50 merks, Robert Dun 100 merks, and to Drumſuy as above, Peter MacWhiter 100 merks, and afterwards 100 l. for his wife's irregularity, David MacGill and John Wright 50 merks each, John Dun 100 merks, Ronald Rob and John Bizzard 25 merks each, and four days impriſonment; John Cuningham not appearing, his family was diſperſed, Ant. Bizzard 100 l. And, if ſo much was exacted in ſuch a ſmall pariſh, for hearing one ſermon out of it, what muſt have been levied in other places? In the pariſhes of Auchinleck and Cumnock the earl of Dumfries charged all perſons to appear before him, and fined all in 50 l. Scots who had not their children baptized by the incumbent. One Andrew Pathen was forced to pay the fine, becauſe he kept his child ſix weeks, though afterwards he carried it to the incumbent; but I omit the other inſtances of this kind.

In Renfrew ſhire matters were conducted much after the ſame manner, for, beſides the hoſtilities committed by lord Roſſe and others, the eſtate of Caldwell being now given to Claverhouſe, he kept a number of his bloody hounds there, who haraſſed the whole country round. One James Stevenſon in Braikoch, though he was neither at Pentland nor Bothwell, yet becauſe he was a tenant of Caldwell's, and would not countenance the epiſcopal incumbent, and had his children baptized by the wandering miniſters, was ſpulied of his all; the dragoon horſes were let looſe upon his victual, his family forced to ſkulk from place to place, and an old ruinous caſtle in the neighbourhood, and other deſert places was his reſort: but that was the fate of many.

The oppreſſions of the ſhire of Lanerk were inferior to none. The provoſt of Rutherglen was exceeding ſevere. For inſtance, he ſent his officers to a widow's in order to apprehend her ſon for not hearing the curate. The youth got out of their hands, and his ſiſter was fined in 30 l. on pretence of being acceſſory to his eſcape, and impriſoned. The mother fell ſick, but was not permitted to have her daughter to wait on her, though bail was offered. After a few days the provoſt came in the night-time, ſearched her houſe for her ſon, and, not finding him, obliged the poor woman to pay him 20 merks. I have often obſerved, that the clergy were the great inſtigators of theſe and ſuch like cruelties. In their viſiting families they generally took a note of thoſe who kept not the church, and from the rolls of the incumbents were formed the rolls of delinquents at theſe courts. My author gives a well-atteſted account of Mr Blair the profligate incumbent at Rutherglen. This wretch, viſiting his families, challenged a poor woman for not keeping the church. She began to give her reaſon; and, among others, mentioned the obligation of the covenants; upon which the ghoſtly father decently called her a covenanted whore, though at that time he was himſelf living in whoredom with one of his own ſervants, as was afterwards diſcovered. In the pariſh of Kilbride capt. Inglis haraſſed many families, and particularly ſeized Andrew Mack, John CarnDuff, and Thomas Miller; and, upon refuſing to give their oath ſuper inquirendis, ordered fiery matches to be put between their fingers, which put them to exquiſite torment. The power of torture was now aſſumed by the commander of a party! That ſame captain went to a widow's houſe to apprehend her ſon, and not finding him he called the neighbours, and made them all ſwear with the family in this form: 'By the Eternal God, and as I am content to loſe my part in heaven, I know not where John Mick is.' Thus the ſoldiers took upon them the power of impoſing oaths, as well as inflicting torture! John Skene laird of Hallyards made terrible havoc in the pariſh of Eaſt-monkland, to the utter ruin of many families for mere non-conformity. Meldrum ſucceeded him, and Inglis came after Meldrum; and in one houſe his party found a boy not 15 years of age, and becauſe he would not ſwear where his maſter was, they wounded him with their ſwords, dragged him by the hair to the fire, held his face before it till his eyes were ready to ſtart out of his head; and, when they thought they had left him for dead, they went off. However, he recovered, though he was diſtracted for ſome time.

It would be endleſs to account for all the particulars. John Archer in Strathmiglo in Fife, having been forced to leave his houſe, two of his children were ſeized with a fever, but were obliged to be removed to a retired houſe, where the other three fell ſick, and where this worthy perſon endured farther perſecution, as ſhall be obſerved in the next chapter. In the town of Inverkeithing, And. Adamſon ſurgeon endured peculiar hardſhips through the inſtigation of Mr Irwine the incumbent, as did likewiſe Thomas Thomſon a ſhip-maſter and his ſon, William Brown baker, Rob. Stuart ſhip maſter, who was long in jail at Edinburgh, with Mr Forreſt of Threeacres near Stirling. Theſe, with many others, were obliged to remove, with their families, becauſe of their non-conformity.

Though there were but few preſbyterians in the north, yet theſe did not eſcape. Mr Pitcairn miniſter at Dron was forced to leave his charge, and retire to Holland; and one Laurence Gibſon, in the neighbouring pariſh of Arngaſk, was put in priſon at Perth, and from thence carried to Edinburgh, and then ſent as a recruit to one of the Scots regiments in the ſervice of the States, where he continued till his father-in-law bought his diſcharge. David Peter, James Proctor, and Tho. Clephan, were apprehended by the ſheriff of Forfar, fined and impriſoned for their non conformity; as was Mrs Minniman a preſbyterian miniſter's widow, by the magiſtrates of Perth, while her only ſon was dangerouſly ill. The child died crying after his mother, and the mother died of grief for her child. Thus the reader may judge what a caſe the poor country was in, and how pleaſed the papiſts muſt have been to behold proteſtants in this manner perſecuting their brethren. I ſhall conclude this chapter by obſerving,

That ſome time laſt ſummer duke Lauderdale died. biſhop Burnet ſays, 'His heart ſeemed quite ſpent. There was not left the bigneſs of a walnut of firm ſubſtance. The reſt was ſpungy liker the lungs than the heart.' And elſewhere he tells us, 'That he was very learned, not only in Latin, in which he was a maſter, but in Greek and Hebrew. He had read a great deal of divinity, and almoſt all the hiſtorians, antient and modern; he had an extraordinary memory, a copious but unpoliſhed expreſſion;' but I ſhall leave the reader to form the reſt of his character from the former part of this hiſtory, and go on to

CHAP. VIII.

Of the commiſſions, the proſecutions before the juſticiary; the Rye houſe plot; the circuit-court; the public executions, and other branches of the perſecution during the year 1683.

THIS and the two following years, open a more diſmal ſcene than any that has gone before; for, as the great deſign of the church of Rome has always been to root out the northern hereſy, ſo our prelatical managers exerted themſelves to the utmoſt to root out the preſbyterians.

The commiſſions granted laſt year, were now enlarged; for, on the 4th of January, John Skene of Hallyards was appointed to receive the rents of the forfeited heritors in the ſhires of Lanerk, Stirling, and Linlithgow, and impowered to call before him, and examine upon oath, whom he

he thought could inform him of thoſe in or acceſſory to the rebellion 1679, and, upon finding any ſufficient evidence to ſecure their goods and chatels till a merchant could be found to purchaſe them; and if any whom he called before him did refuſe to ſwear, he was to confine them in the next priſon. Who could be ſafe when ſuch powers as theſe were given to wicked men, who would ſtick at nothing.

The ſame day the Rev. Mr M. Potter was before the council, and upon his owning to have kept houſe conventicles, and refuſing to engage not to preach the goſpel, was committed to the Baſs, where he continued two years. Then he was permitted to leave the country. However. Argyll landing about that time, he kept himſelf concealed till 1687. Mr Potter was privately licenſed and ordained 1673. After which, by the inſtigation of the biſhop of Dumblain, he was hunted as a patridge on the mountains, preaching where he could till 1677, when he went to Holland for ſome months. Upon his return he was forced to keep out of the way, but was apprehended about the end of the laſt year, and now was ſent to the Baſs.

The ſame day John Row, chamberlain to Sir William Primroſe of Carring, beng informed againſt for conventicles, was outlawed. and the general was ordered to ſend parties in queſt of him, and if they could not find him, to ſecure his goods for the king's uſe.

The proſecutions before the juſticiary were now very numerous; and the better to anſwer the deſigns of the perſecutors, a letter was procured from the king, and read before the lords on the 8th of January, ordering them to examine witneſſes upon oath previous to the trial. But how well it became judges to take the oaths of witneſſes before trial I muſt leave to be determined by others. As it requires one ſkilled in the laws of Scotland to make proper remarks on this, I ſhall therefore leave it.

The ſame day Tho. Cuningham of Montgrenan was indicted before them for treaſon and rebellion, His confeſſion, that he and others joined the rebels at Bothwell, was the proof. However, he begged the lords might intercede for his pardon, and declared that he was willing to take the teſt. He was brought in guilty, but the ſentence was not pronounced till the 15th, when he was ſentenced to be hanged at the croſs of Edinburgh on the firſt Wedneſday of April; but it ſeems he was pardoned.

On the ſaid 8th of January William Martin of Dullurg junior was indicted for treaſon and rebellion, but upon renouncing the heritage, the proceſs was dropt, and he was made to oblige himſelf to appear when ſummoned. W. MacClelland of Auchinguil, H. Maxwell of Cail, and W. MacCulloch of Gilchred, came off the ſame way. The laſt took the bond of peace and the teſt, and was releaſed.

There was ſcarce any thing, under this adminiſtration more unaccountable, though it was very common, than to proſecute huſbands for the non conformity of their wives, and fathers for converſing with their own children. The magiſtrates of Edinburgh, having their caſe frequently before them, propoſed ſome queries concerning it to the council. A committee was appointed on the 11th of January, who gave it as their opinion. 1. That wives ought to be fined in the half of their huſbands fines, and that the huſbands were to have defalcations off the wife's jointure. 2. That regular huſbands, on producing their wives to the magiſtrates, were no farther anſwerable. 3. That widows were to be fined in the half of their late huſbands fines. 4. That unmarried women were to be fined according to the condition of their deceaſt parents, and their own condition as to their fortunes. 5. That parents were anſwerable for their children's keeping the church when they were ſeven years of age, and fit to be catechiſed. In ſhort, all the regular huſbands had to do, was to produce their irregular wives to the judge ordinary, who, if they ſhould prove contomacious, was to lay the matter before the council.

The ſame day the caſe of Andrew Herron of Kerochtree was before the council, for converſing with his own ſon, and his ſon in law, who had been at Bothwell, and, being aſhamed to take his life, they procured a letter from the king to impower them to fine him as they ſaw proper. Accordingly, though he was pardoned as to his life and eſtate, yet he was afterwards fined in 5000 merks, which he actually paid.

On the 27th Sir John Harper, ſheriff depute of Lanerk, was impriſoned in the caſtle of Edinburgh on ſuſpicion of treaſon, that is, correſponding with ſome of the perſecuted party. This gentleman was abundantly regular, as they called it; but he was not ſo violent in proſecuting the ſufferers as ſome would have had him; he lay ſome months in priſon, and at laſt was releaſed upon giving a bond of 10,000 l. ſterling to appear when called.

On the 31ſt the ſureties of Sir T. Stuart of Gultneh, Hamilton of Monkland, of both afterwards, Mr J Oſborn and Mr Hugh Crawford, were ſummoned to preſent their perſons according to their bond. Mr Oſborn, a few days after this, appeared before the council, and, owned he preached in houſes, had it in his choice, either to depart the kingdom, or oblige himſelf not to keep conventicles, under the pain of 5000 merks. He choſe the laſt.

About this time the Revd Mr John MacGilligen appeared before the council, and, being charged with conventicles, irregular marriages and baptiſms, and refuſing to ſwear againſt himſelf, was fined in 5000 merks, and ſent to the Baſs till he ſhould pay it, or oblige himſelf to depart the kingdom, never to return without his majeſty's licence. However ſevere this ſentence was, yet ſome who were abſent at that time thought it too mild and attempted to have a ſentence of another nature paſſed againſt him; but all their attempts proved fruitleſs. He continued in the Baſs till the year 1686, and, as appears from his diary, had much of the divine preſence with him, and a believing proſpect of the nations, deliverance from the hands of its preſent oppreſſors. Though to ſcoffers it may appear ridiculous, yet to the pious reader, what he ſays on the 23d of September 1684, will, I am perſuaded, be agreeable. 'This day I got my heart poured out before the Lord, for the diſtreſs, deſtruction and deſolation of the land, and the ruin and overthrow of his intereſt. The Lord will have mercy and heal, recover his own glory, reform his church, reſtore his ordinances, purge his ſervants, and cauſe ſacrifices to be offered in righteouſneſs to himſelf.—He will ſtrike with his right hand, and with it bring back the ark and the glory, and cauſe the days of joy and gladneſs be according to the days of ſorrow and ſadneſs we have ſeen.'

By the way I cannot but obſerve, that we, in this generation, may look upon all the privileges, both religious and civil, that have flowed from the revolution, to be, in a great meaſure, owing, under God, to the prayers of the diſtreſſed ſufferers in this diſmal period. Happy had it been for the nation had they been better improved, and happy would it be did we but mourn over our great defections, and labour after that reformation which our worthies contended for, and ſealed with their blood!

While Mr MacGilligen was thus employed, ſummons of adjudication was raiſed againſt the ſmall eſtate he had in the ſhire of Roſs. But the lords, by the intereſt of the laird of Tarbet, afterwards earl of Cromarty, put a ſtop to the fire. At laſt he was releaſed, and ventured home, to the inexpreſſible joy of his old hearers. At the revolution, he, with the conſent of his people, went to Inverneſs, where, after preaching a ſhort while, he died in the Lord, June 8. 1689. My author ſays he was the only miniſter in the province of Roſs who at the firſt aſſult oppoſed prelacy. He was of great ſervice to many miniſters, as Mr Hog of Kilteern, Mr Roſs at Kincardin, and Mr Anderſon at Cromarty. It was at his houſe that the worthy Mr Angus Macbean, formerly epiſcopal miniſter at Inverneſs, preached his recantation ſermon, from Job xxxiv. 31, 32. A relation of his caſe and ſufferings had been well worth the inſerting, but I have not the particulars. He died in priſon about the time king William landed in England.

On the ſaid 31ſt of January a proceſs was commenced before the juſticiary againſt Mr William Lawrie of Blackwood. This gentleman was apprehended laſt year, and indicted for treaſon; becauſe as they alledged, he had allowed ſeveral of his tenants, who had been at Bothwell, to return to their farms, and received rent from them; and therefore; ſay they, he hath incurred the pain of treaſon, ſon, at leaſt was art and part with them in the ſaid crimes. He was farther indicted for commiſſionating, giving order to, or conniving at James Cleland and James Wilſon, known rebels, to come in the month of May or June 1679, to the houſe of Douglas and take away two cannons and ſeveral horſes belonging to the marquis of Douglas. It was pleaded in his behalf, that the perſons named in the indictment were tenants included in the indemnity, and that therefore the lieges might receive them as tenants, though they had not taken the bond of peace, ſince they were not intercommuned. His lawyers urged farther, that he could not be proſecuted for converſe with rebels, unleſs the perſons he is ſaid to have converſed with had been legally convicted of rebellion. It was likewiſe argued, that he was no ways acceſſory to the taking the cannons from Douglas caſtle, nor converſed with the ſaid Cleland and Wilſon till the October following, when they were openly at his father's funeral; that Wilſon was a common and known drover, and therefore he dealt with him as all the country did. However, on the 7th of February the lords, notwithſtanding all that could be ſaid in his defence, and though nothing could be proved againſt him, condemned him to loſe his head at the market croſs of Edinburgh on the laſt of February.

Biſhop Burnet, who through miſtake calls this gentleman by the name of Weir of Blackwood, after giving ſome general account of this affair, ſays, 'This was ſuch conſtructive treaſon, that went upon ſo many unreaſonable ſuppoſitions, that it ſhewed the ſhameleſſneſs of a ſort of men who had been for forty years declaiming againſt a parliamentary attainder for a conſtructive treaſon, in the caſe of the earl of Strafford, and did now, in a common court of juſtice, condemn a man upon a train of ſo many inferences, that it was not poſſible to make it look even like a conſtructive treaſon.' He adds, that, though the marquis of Douglas wrote earneſtly to the duke for his pardon, that was denied. However, he was reprieved from time to time, and ſo was not executed. This, continues the hiſtorian, put all the gentry in a great fright. Many knew they were as obnoxious as Blackwood, and none could have the comfort to know that he was ſafe.

There were ſeveral other gentlemen proſecuted before the juſticiary, as John Menzies in Dalquharn, John Gibſon of Auchiochain, Robert Ferguſon of Letterpin, Will. M'Culloch in Cleichred, and James Lawrie writer in Lanerk, but none of them were executed.

While the juſticiary were thus engaged the council was not idle; for on the 8th of February they fined John Hamilton of Gilckreickeugh in 2000 merks, becauſe his lady had been at houſe-conventicles, and on the 12th deprived Sir John Dalrymple of Stair of his bailiary in Glenluce, fined him in 500 l. ſterling, and ordered him to the caſtle of Edinburgh till he made payment. The reaſons of this are not to be found.

The ſufferings of John Archer in Straithmiglo were renewed this month. Before his children recovered, he was ſeized with a violent fit of the gravel. While in this caſe a party of Balcarra's troop came, apprehended and carried him, his wife and five ſmall children, to Kirkaldy priſon. Next day the provoſt releaſed the mother and children, on finding bail to preſent herſelf to the ſheriff when called. After John had continued in jail three weeks, he was carried to Edinburgh, and was firſt before a committee, and then before the council. And though nothing but non conformity could be laid to his charge, he was ſent to the iron-houſe in the priſon of Edinburgh, where he continued in irons 17 days. It was thought this ſevere treatment was much owing to his not giving biſhop Burnet of St. Andrews his titles. He remained in jail above five months, when he was releaſed by the intereſt of a ſouth country gentleman, who had a ſingular regard for his brother Mr Thomas. After ſome reſpite he was again perſecuted; ſo that, for a whole winter, he could not ly two nights in his own houſe, but was obliged to make the beſt ſhift he could. Sometimes in the night time he would come home and work a little at his trade, being a candle maker, and retire out of the way in the day time.

On the 1ſt of March major White's commiſſion was extended to the pariſhes of Egliſholm, Mearns, Carmonnock, and Kilbride, it being alledged that diſorderly perſons not only lived, but were likewiſe ſheltered in theſe places; but, as the bounds of his commiſſion were now very large, he was impowered to ſend a depute to the remote places where he could not conveniently attend. The major was abundantly ſevere, but his deputes exceeded him; and by this means the oppreſſion became very general there being but few pariſhes that had not either the major or his deputes.

At the ſame time Claverhouſe, Meldrum, and major White, had inſtructions to diſcover all in the late rebellion, who were not in the porteous or fugitive rolls, and ſend them priſoners to Edinburgh, in caſe they ſhould have two witneſſes to ſwear againſt them; to ſend the names of thoſe heritors who had harboured or converſed with rebels, that the council might take a proper courſe with them; to fine to the utmoſt petty heritors, who were likewiſe tenants; to ſend an account to the chancellor of thoſe indulged miniſters who had tranſgreſſed their rules; to grant ſafe conduct for fourteen days to thoſe in the late rebellion, who ſhould throw themſelves on the king's mercy; to ſend the names of unlicenſed chaplains, and of thoſe who entertained them, to the chancellor, the archbiſhop of St Andrews, or biſhop of Edinburgh, that the fines impoſed by law might be exacted; and, laſtly, to call for the books and records of ſheriffs, bailies of regalities within their bounds, and examine what fines had been impoſed in caſe of church-diſorders, that they might regulate them as they ſhould ſee cauſe. The like inſtructions were given to others; but the particular effects of them are not known.

On the 8th and 9th of March major White held courts in the church of Carmmonock, where many were called before him. The country people were kept from one court-day to another, to their great detriment in this time of labour. Soldiers were ſent to the houſes of thoſe who did not appear. They who appeared, and would not ſwear they were at church, at leaſt every third Sabbath, were fined as the major thought proper. By the inſtigation of Mr Boyd the curate, his predeceſſor, the Rev. Mr Andrew Mortoun, was ſummoned for alledged baptizing and preaching in that pariſh, but not appearing was fined in 30,000 merks; ſo that he was obliged to conceal himſelf till the liberty 1687. From 8 or 9 poor country people in the pariſh White exacted 277 l. for abſence from the church, or rather becauſe they would not ſwear that they kept it in terms of law. At another court-day 25 were fined for not hearing the curate, ſome in 50, and ſome in 25 l. and 12 women in 6 dollars each.

White likewiſe executed his commiſſion in other parts of his bounds, and particularly held courts at Kilmarnock, and exerciſed more ſeverities than are neceſſary to be related. Jaſper Touch, a young ſurgeon in that place, was fined in 19 l. ſterling, becauſe he would not ſwear he had been at church every third Sabbath; and, refuſing to ſign the bond of regularity, he and ſeveral others were ſent to priſon; at laſt he was releaſed, upon paying 27 rix dollars; but frequently after this he was haraſſed for his non conformity, being forced to abſcond, and leave his ſhop and buſineſs to the care of an apprentice. In his abſence he was ſeverely fined by col. Buchan who held one of theſe courts at Kilmarnock, had his ſervant impriſoned, and an inventary taken of all his houſhold furniture. The colonel being called to Glaſgow, Mr Touch returned; but, when the colonel came back, he was impriſoned, and with great difficulty was releaſed, upon giving ſecurity, under the penalty of 1000 merks to appear before him or the council on ſix days notice. Meldrum was likewiſe very diligent in the execution of his commiſſion. But enough has been ſaid upon this.

On the 12th of March a letter from the king came to the juſticiary, and, much about the ſame time another to the council, requiring them to ſend extracts from the regiſters of the indictments, trials, proclamations, &c. together with copies of the ſeveral treaſonable declarations, proclamations, bonds of combination in Sanquhar, Lanerk, Rutherglen, &c. in order to their being digeſted and methodized by C. Hanſes of Gray's Inn, eſq; London, and publiſhed for the ſatisfaction of the king's good ſubjects. But it does not appear that this was complied with. My author juſtly obſerves, that, had ſuch a thing been done with any ſincerity, it would have ſaved him a great deal of trouble; but that was not to be expected.

On the 15th Mr John Philip, late epiſcopal miniſter of Queensferry, having been turned out for refuſing the teſt, was before the council, and charged with ſaying, in the parliament-houſe, that the duke of Albany and York was a bloody man, a tyrant, and diſtaſteful to the ſubjects; that the king's advocate and biſhop of Edinburgh were bloody and cruel men; that the earl of Argyll was unjuſtly forfeited, &c. After witneſſes were brought to prove theſe things, the council fined him in 2000 l. ſterling, and ordered him to be kept priſoner in the Baſs during life; ſignifying, at the ſame time, that, if he did not pay his fine within 15 days, they would order the advocate to purſue him for his life before the juſticiary. The caſh keeper was commanded next council day to ſeize all his books and papers.

On the 22d the council, being informed that the lady Caldwell and her daughter were impriſoned for conventicles, ordered them to be ſent to the caſtle of Blackneſs. This excellent widow lady was Barbara daughter to Sir William Cuningham of Cuninghamhead. She had a dowry out of the lands of Caldwell ſuitable to her rank; but, neglecting to take infeftment before her huſband's forfeiture, ſhe and her four children were cruelly turned out of her right, and obliged to ſupport herſelf by her own and the induſtry of her virtuous children.

About the beginning of this year, while ſhe lived peaceably in her apartment in Glaſgow, one who lived over a gainſt her went to provoſt Burns, a violent perſecutor, and told him, that through the glaſs of her window he ſaw a miniſter preaching. Upon this falſe information ſhe was impriſoned, and without any other proof, ſhe was ſent to Blackneſs caſtle, where ſhe and her eldeſt daughter remained cloſely confined for almoſt a year. When, by this cloſe confinement, Mrs Jean's health was impaired, ſhe was with difficulty releaſed, and, as a mighty favour her mother was allowed now and then the benefit of the air. But they would not allow her to ſee her ſecond daughter Mrs Ann, though ſhe was ſeized with a fever which proved her death. She continued priſoner ſeveral years unconvicted of any crime, and never accuſed but by one witneſs. And though it had been true that a miniſter preached at that time in her apartment, yet the laws then in being required proof that there were more than five preſent beſides the family. The law had not prohibited family-worſhip; and though the lawyers openly connived at popiſh maſſes in families, yet prelatic fury vented itſelf, for the moſt part, only againſt preſbyterians. This lady was not releaſed till king James's liberty of conſcience.

At this time the lady Kaitloch ſuffered conſiderably: for a garriſon, that was ſent to take poſſeſſion of her houſe, moſt cruelly turned her and her ſmall family to the fields; and it was eſteemed a favour that they allowed her to lodge for ſome time in a cold barn. At laſt ſhe and her children were forced to leave the kingdom, and died abroad.

Some of the ſoldiers of this garriſon found a poor man at prayer in the fields, and brought him to the garriſon, who kept him three days in the guard-houſe, where his pious ſoul was vexed at the dreadful profanation of God's name. At laſt, becauſe he refuſed the teſt, he was turned out of his houſe, and forced to wander up and down for ſeveral years.

On the 22d of March John Niſbet younger, (ſo called to diſtinguiſh him from John Niſbet of Hardhill) who lived in the pariſh of Loudon, was tried by major White, aſſiſted by W. Creichton ſheriff-depute of Ayr, who, with others, was veſted with a juſticiary-power. When, upon his examination, he refuſed to inform againſt John Niſbet of Hardhill, the major impiouſly threatened to make him ſit three hours in hell. It is not worth while to inſert their jeering queſtions. As to the archbiſhop's death, he ſaid he was not a judge; that Bothwell was ſelf-defence; that he acknowleged none to be the head of the church but Chriſt. Being aſked if the king was king, or not? he told them he was once a covenanted king; and, as to his being king now, he referred it to his obligations in the coronation oath to be conſidered. Being then aſked if he was his king, he refuſed to anſwer. This was all they had to lay to his charge; and for this he was condemned to be hanged at Kilmarnock on the 14th of April, which was done accordingly. He had a grave courage and ſtayedneſs when he came to the place of execution. After he had prayed, he ſung Pſalm xvi. from ver. 5, to the end, read Rom. viii. and prayed again. He was allowed to ſpeak a conſiderable time to the ſpectators, wherein he recommended religion, and preſſed them to godlineſs from his own experience. He told them that this was the firſt execution in that place, and was likely not to be the laſt; that death was before them all,—but, as for himſelf, the ſting of it was taken away, and he reckoned every ſtep of that ladder to be a ſtep nearer heaven. He was interrupted when beginning to give an account of the cauſe of his ſufferings, upon which he drew the napkin over his face, and was turned over, committing his ſoul into his Father's hands. His laſt ſpeech and teſtimony the reader may find in the Cloud of Witneſſes; in which he ſays, among other things, as for my not praying for the king in his perſon and authority, this I dare not do, it being a perfect owning of him in all he hath done, &c.

On the 2d of April a proceſs of forfeiture was raiſed againſt John Balfour of Kinloch, John Ruſſel portioner of Kettle, for killing the archbiſhop; Robert Hamilton brother to Sir William Hamilton of Preſtoun, for commanding the weſt country army at Bothwell; Mr John Hog miniſter at Rotterdam, Mr Robert Fleming there, —Smith, Mr Robert Langlands, Andrew and John Ruſſels factors, and James Stuart ſon to Sir James Stuart provoſt of Edinburgh, for ſupplying the rebels with money and neceſſaries ever ſince, &c. Robert Hamilton and John Balfour were ſentenced to be executed when apprehended. John Ruſſel, Meſſ. Hog, Langlands, Smith and Stuart were outlawed and forfeited. The diet was deferred as to Mr Fleming and Andrew Ruſſel, the council having ſufficient teſtimonials of their loyalty.

The ſame day Sir William Denholm of Weſtfield, Mr G. Cuningham indulged miniſter at Dunlop, for correſponding with Mr John Cuningham of Bedlane, were outlawed, as was likewiſe Archibald Menzies younger of Culdairs, for ſaying one day in priſon, That fools made the teſt, and knaves take it.

Though the commiſſions given to major White, Cleverhouſe, and others, and the extenſive powers veſted in the commiſſioners, might have been thought ſufficient for ſuppreſſing all whom they called fanatics, yet there muſt be more circuit courts clothed with all the power of the council and juſticiary. Accordingly, on the 13th of April, a proclamation was publiſhed, in conſequence of a royal letter which they received on the 10th, ſetting forth, among other things, that though his majeſty had been too often induced to grant indemnities, indulgences and other favours, to that fanatic and diſaffected party, which only emboldens them to abuſe his royal goodneſs; yet it was, and is now more than ever, his firm reſolution to root out theſe ſeditious and rebellious principles, and to maintain the church government as it is eſtabliſhed by law; therefore he required the council, and all judges and magiſtrates, to execute the laws with rigour, againſt all who, ſince the late indemnity, had been, or afterwards ſhould be found guilty of fanatical diſorders, and to proſecute, before the juſtices, all who are, or ſhall be found guilty of receiving, harbouring, or converſing with perſons forfeited, traitors, &c. but, leſt any have inadvertently fallen into that miſtake, he recommends to the council to command the advocate to order ſuch as they ſuſpect to be ſummoned before them, and to judge them, upon evidence or the oath of parties, as they ſhall ſee fit; or, in caſe they ſhall refuſe to ſwear, or appear, to repute them as guilty, and to reſtrict the ordinary pains of treaſon to baniſhment, fining or other arbitrary puniſhment; but to be indemnified if they appear and ſatisfy the council. He likewiſe gave the council authority to commiſſionate whom they thought fit, in the reſpective ſhires, for judging thoſe whom they had not time or conveniency to call before themſelves, and that in the ſame way, and with the ſame powers that themſelves, were poſſeſſed of. And ſince ſeveral of the common people, who were in the late rebellion rebellion, have loſt the benefit of the indemnity, by not taking the bond in due time, his majeſty declares, that upon their taking the teſt they ſhall be completely indemnified; and, for puniſhing thoſe that refuſe to be reclaimed, he ordered circuit-courts to be holden in the weſtern and ſouthern ſhires, and other places needful, in the months of May, June, July, and Auguſt next, after exact porteous rolls of delinquents are taken and publiſhed. The circuit court was to ſit at Stirling on the 5th of June, at Glaſgow the 12th, at Ayr the 15th, at Dumfries the 26th, &c. Then the common people, in taking the teſt, were to do it on their knees, and to ſign it, by themſelves or a notary, in preſence of the perſons mentioned in the proclamation.

This is the ſubſtance of a long proclamation, in which the king was made to ſignify his repentance for his former lenity, the contrary of which we have had all along inconteſted proofs of, through the former part of this hiſtory, and to declare his reſolution to extirpate all fanatic principles. It would have been very acceptable to his beloved brother, had he undertook to extirpate the northern hereſy; however this was a good preparative. The teſt was to be impoſed upon all ſuſpected perſons, though by act of parliament, none but thoſe in offices of power and truſt were required to take it; but the duke of York had foretold that the teſt ſhould fall upon others than Catholics.

To pave the way for theſe circuit courts, the council, on the 18th of April, made an act, ordering the clerks of the criminal-court not to inſert in the ordinary porteous rolls, any noblemen, or ſheriff-principles or provoſts of burghs where the circuit was to ſit, &c. but that the clerk and his depute ſhall take all information they can have againſt all perſons whatſoever; and, in caſe any noblemen, &c. be informed againſt, that they keep a particular and private roll for ſuch perſons, which the clerks muſt keep ſecret at their peril, and ſend in theſe private rolls to the council. Here ſeems to be deeds of darkneſs. Next day they agreed upon inſtructions to the commiſſioners of juſticiary at the circuit courts, and their clerks, in taking up of dittays, or in procuring informations againſt perſons to be fined at the ſaid courts, which need not be inſerted. But, that the reader may have ſome view of the ſhare the prelatical clergy had in the informations given in at this time, a paper was diſperſed among them, whether by the order of the biſhops or the council is not known.

The title of it was, Liſt of things to be done by the miniſter in each pariſh, 1683. 'They were to give in, upon oath, a liſt of their ſeſſioners, their clerks, and bellmen, of withdrawers from the church and non-communicants —to give an account of all diſorders and rebellions, and who were guilty — and a compleat roll of all within the pariſh, and particular liſt of all the heritors. That all women who were delinquents be given up as well as men. That they give account of all perſons who have gone out of their pariſhes, and the reaſons of it,—of fugitives, their wives, or widows,—and all reſetters of them, and of chapmen and travellers. That they declare who are the people in their pariſhes who can give the beſt account of all theſe particulars, that ſuch may be brought in and examined.'

This was fine employment for miniſters of the goſpel! But it is too well confirmed that ſuch work as this was more agreeable to theſe orthodox clergy, than what really belonged to their office. The reader will eaſily obſerve, that the ſeſſioners, as they are called, were made uſe of only as informers againſt innocent people. A vile proſtitution of the office of ruling elder! But the clergy were at the bottom of all the perſecution of this period.

During the months of March and April Claverhouſe exerciſed his powers to the utmoſt in the ſouth; and that country was grievouſly harraſſed by ſearching for Mr Cameron's followers, for all who had been at Bothwell, all of the fugitive roll, and who had not appeared at courts; for multitudes were forced to wander in mountains and caves, and many, through other parts of the kingdom, had retired for ſhelter to the mountaneous places in Galloway and Nithſdale. There were likewiſe ſpies and informers who were bribed by the ſoldiers; neither were the papiſts inactive in informing againſt theſe wanderers; for theſe, being of the duke's religion, were not only overlooked, but alſo met with encouragement, while many innocent people were expoſed to the greateſt hardſhips.

At this time Meldrum had ſent in Walter Thomſon, Walter Smith, and—Turnbull priſoners to Edinburgh, becauſe they would not pay the ſame fines over again to him that they had paid to the ſheriff of Roxburgh. The three priſoners repreſented this to the council, and were releaſed; but no notice was taken of Meldrum.

On the 4th of May, David MacMillan, James Brown, John Paterſon, William Miller, James Gemble, George Lapſly and Robert Lawſon, were before the lords of juſticiary at Edinburgh. The firſt was executed, the four next took the teſt and were releaſed. The two laſt refuſed the teſt, and were continued to the 10th of June; but their indictment was found relevant.

David MacMillan, before a committee of the council, acknowleged that he was apprehended in a church for being at Bothwell; but then he ſaid, that Bothwell was not rebellion, being in defence of the truth; that he acknowleged the preſent authority, as far as the king had kept his engagements according to the word of God. When this confeſſion was read before the juſticiary, he ſaid that ſomething was inſerted which he had not ſpoken, particulary concerning the biſhop's death. Upon which the preſident ſaid, Well, what ſay you to that now? He anſwered, that he had no judgment to judge ſuch heads. He refuſed the teſt, which was offered him as the condition of ſaving his life, and was therefore ſentenced to be hanged at the Graſs-market on the 16th of May. He ſuffered with John Wilſon, of whom I am now to ſpeak, and died with a great deal of peace and compoſure. In the paper he left behind him he bleſſed God who had inclined him to 'join with the perſecuted party at Bothwell, —and earneſtly wiſhed that love might continue among the godly, notwithſtanding the differences in religion; and preſſed all to mourn for broken vows and promiſes, ſlighted offers and opportunities, and a broken covenant; and declared that he died in the faith of it, that God would return to Scotland; that he adhered to the Confeſſion of Faith, Catechiſms and covenants; and left his teſtimony againſt hearing of the curates, paying of teſs, and the indulgence.—My ſoul, concludes he, ſhall bleſs him through all the ages of eternity.'

The ſame 4th May John Wilſon writer in Lanerk was brought before the juſticiary, and, having been formerly condemned to die, was now ordered for execution on the 9th. He had been at Bothwell, and owned that he had acted as captain there. When apprehended he reſolved to uſe the utmoſt freedom, and, at the ſame time, as much caution and prudence as was conſiſtent with truth.

On the 17th of April he was examined before a committee of the council, and, among other things, was aſked what he thought of Bothwell. Was it not unlawful to riſe in arms? He ſaid he durſt not ſay it was unlawful; for the confeſſion in the teſt ſays, that it is a good work to defend the life of the harmleſs; and that however God had diſpoſed of theſe people, yet he ſuppoſed the Lord would own thoſe, who, hearing their neighbours had been worſhipping God, and (for defending themſelves againſt thoſe that ſought their life) were in jeopardy of their lives, thought it their duty to riſe for their relief. Then they aſked if Pentland was rebellion. He anſwered, that the oppreſſion of that poor people was ſo great, that the then rulers condemned Sir James Turner for his cruelty. One of them ſaid, that he knew Sir James went not the length of his commiſſion. Then they aſked if the biſhop's death was murder? He deſired to be excuſed; for he would not anſwer that queſtion; and, being preſſed again and again, he told them, it being nothing that concerned his ſalvation, he did not pry into it. Then they ſaid, how did Bothwell concern your ſalvation? He ſaid, there was none who engaged themſelves in ſervice to God, but they behoved to be at his call: and it being for ſaving the life of the harmleſs, he durſt not ſit God's bidding. He was alſo examined concerning authority, but got not time to anſwer; and, in the remarks he made on this examination, he regreted that he did not improve this opportunity in teſtifying againſt the eccleſiaſtical headſhip. He was alſo examined the ſame day before the council, where he owned ed his being at Bothwell, and declared that he did not think it rebellion, vindicated the lawfulneſs of ſelf defence. And, when they aſked if he owned authority, he ſaid, 'Government might be taken ſeveral ways. 1. 'For the ſimple command of the prince. 2. For the more public command of the prince and people. 3. For the power a prince may be clothed with by a people. 4. For a prince's right to govern a people. As many of the prince's edicts and acts of parliament were againſt preſbyterians and preſbyterian government, he could not own it in the two firſt ſenſes, unleſs he denied himſelf to be a preſbyterian. He added, he could not own it in the third ſenſe, ſince the people had clothed the king with the headſhip of the church. As to the laſt ſenſe, his right to govern, he had not ſeen through the denial of it.' He alſo makes remarks on this examination, which the reader will find in the Cloud of Witneſſes. In his papers he gave an account of what had paſſed between the advocate and him. The advocate told him there was room for mercy, if he did not obſtinately perſiſt in his opinion. He anſwered, that he had delivered no opinion but what he had juſtified from the Confeſſion of Faith, which he had lately ſworn, &c. He was aſked if he would bond before ſentence, there being no room for mercy afterwards. He anſwered he would not, and, at another day all ſentences would be canvaſſed before the great Judge of heaven and earth. His friends adviſed him to ſupplicate for a reprieve, till he ſhould be better adviſed as to his anſwers to the council, or becauſe of his confuſions ſince he came to priſon, or that he might have longer time to prepare for eternity; but he refuſed to petition on any of theſe grounds. He ſaid, had his petition gone on the firſt ground, it would be a declaring to the world that he called his principles in queſtion. The ſecond would be a ſlandering Chriſt's croſs, wherein every ſtep had been to him mercy and truth. And, as to the third, he could not do it in faith. However on the 7th of May, he gave in a petition for a reprieve, on account of his wife's caſe, who was then big with child; and he afterwards declared, that he had ſolid peace in ſo doing. During theſe things he had a conference with Sir William Paterſon, biſhop Paterſon's brother, concerning the grounds upon which he ſtated his ſufferings, in which he vindicated the lawfulneſs of defenſive arms; but the conference had no influence to alter any of the ſides. Mr Wilſon was reprieved till the 16th, when he ſuffered with David MacMillan according to his ſentence. His laſt teſtimony is in the Cloud of Witneſſes, in which, among other things he ſays, 'I am really of that opinion, that God ſhall root this race of kings, root and branch, away, and make them like Zeba and Zalmunna, for taking God's houſe in poſſeſſion, and reſolving to root out the ſeed of the godly under the name of fanatics.' He moſt chearfully left his wife, children and ſiſters, upon God, and died in the Lord.

There were, at this time, but few in the northern parts of the kingdom that were firm to the principles of the reformation. However there were ſome, as we have formerly obſerved, and among others the family of Fowlis. My author obſerves, that, on the 8th of May, Sir John Munro of Fowlis elder was by the council confined to his own houſe in the ſhire of Roſs, and a mile round it, for his alledged withdrawing from his pariſh church. This gentleman, on account of his corpulent ſtructure, was nicknamed the mortar-piece of preſbytery: His eminent piety and zeal expoſed him to no ſmall ſufferings at times; for, beſides a long confinement, his eſtate, which before was conſiderable, was haraſſed by ſeveral fines and confiſcations, from which it has not been fully recovered to this day. I am ſorry I cannot give a more particular account of the ſufferings of this gentleman, whoſe family greatly ſupported the intereſt of the reformation in the north of Scotland, and who had three grandſons who loſt their lives in the laſt unnatural rebellion, ſtanding up in defence of the religion and liberties of their country, in oppoſition to a pretended branch of a family that has been the conſtant plagues of Great Britain, viz. Sir Rob. Munro of Fowlis, captain George Munro of Culcairn, and Dr Duncan Munro: but, as the Rev. Dr Doddridge of Northampton has favoured the world with ſome account of this family, in his appendix to his remarkable paſſages in the life of colonel Gairdner, who was killed in the battle of Preſton 1745, thither I refer the reader.

On the 10th of May Mr James Renwick was ordained at Groningen. The ſocieties for general correſpondence, conſidering the diſmal ſituation things were in at this time, and that they had no miniſters they could join with, agreed to ſend Mr Renwick to the univerſity of Groningen, in the united provinces, to proſecute his ſtudies; which he did with much approbation for the ſpace of ſix months, and was ordained, indefinitely, to the work of the miniſtry, by the impoſition of hands. The Rev. Mr Shields ſays, 'Such was the caſe of that poor people that made application, that they could neither get faithful miniſters free of defections, whom, with freedom of conſcience, they might call,—nor would they anſwer their reiterated requeſts whom they did call; neither would any miniſters, at that time, oppoſite to their teſtimony, ordain any of their way; nor could they ſeek it without condemning their teſtimony, &c. therefore they ſent Mr Renwick to the provinces.' In the Informatory Vindication it is ſaid, 'Though the claſſis of Groningen, by whom he was ordained, differ from the reformation of Scotland, in her beſt times, in ſome things, yet, conſidering, 1. That in theſe differences they were never reformed, and ſo cannot be charged therein with defection. 2. That they agree with the true preſbyterial church of Scotland in all principles againſt popery, prelacy, eraſtianiſm, and all heretical and ſectarian errors. 3. That they did then object nothing againſt our preſent teſtimony. 4. That they came under a general and far other conſideration, being of a foreign church, than miniſters of the ſame original church, and under the ſame head of covenant with ourſelves.—5. That in the act of ordination they did obtrude none of theſe differences, but took him engaged to teach according to the word of God, the Confeſſion of Faith of the church of Scotland, and the diſcipline thereof; upon all which conſiderations it was thought lawful to accept of ordination from the ſaid claſſis.'——Accordingly Mr Renwick, inſtead of the Belgic forms, was allowed to ſign the Weſtminſter Confeſſion and Catechiſms.

On the laſt of May, or firſt of June, Mr Alexander Gordon laird of Earlſtoun was taken at Newcaſtle, going to Holland. This worthy gentleman, having been much abroad ſince Bothwell, returned and joined the ſocieties. He was pitched upon, at one of their general meetings, and, ſays Mr Wodrow, joined in a commiſſion with his brother-in law Robert Hamilton, to repair to Holland, to repreſent the circumſtances and principles of thoſe people to the reformed churches there: but it would ſeem my author is miſtaken in the circumſtances of Earlſtoun's commiſſion from the ſocieties; for Mr Shields ſays, that after the publiſhing of the Lanerk declaration, the next general meeting, finding themſelves much condemned, reproached and informed againſt in foreign churches, as if they had fallen from the principles of the church of Scotland, into wild errors, thought it expedient to ſend the laird of Earlſtoun to the united provinces, to vindicate themſelves from theſe reproaches. This was in the year 1682. And I find that Earlſtoun's commiſſion was dated at Edinburgh 2d of April 1682, and ſubſcribed by John Renwick, and ſent to him at Newcaſtle; but the above Robert Hamilton is not ſo much as mentioned it. Whether he got another commiſſion laſt ſpring is more than I know. However, when Earlſtoun and his ſervant Edward Atkins were apprehended, he was aboard of a ſhip bound from Newcaſtle to Holland; and, leſt his papers ſhould fall into the hands of his enemies, he threw them into the ſea, but they were obſerved and taken up, and both of them were ſent to Newgate.

This affair made the more noiſe at this time, as it happened when a pretended plot was ſaid to be diſcovered againſt the king's life; and the council and biſhops were big with expectations of mighty diſcoveries from Earlſtoun's papers; but, upon the ſtricteſt examination of them, nothing was found but a letter ſigned I. H. commiſſions and inſtructions from the ſocieties, with letters to ſome Dutch miniſters and Scotſmen in Holland, and papers on civil buſineſs.

The

The conſpiracy pretended now to be carried on was that commonly called The Rye-houſe plot, becauſe, as was alledged, the conſpirators had formed a deſign to aſſaſſinate the king and duke at the houſe of the Rye, within two miles of Hodſdon in Hertfordſhire, which was then inhabited by Richard Rumbold. An ingenious writer, ſpeaking of this and other ſham plots, ſays, 'The ſhattered remains of Engliſh liberty were then attacked on every ſide; and ſome of the nobleſt blood of the nation was offered up a ſacrifice to the manes of popiſh martyrs, and made to atone for the bill of excluſion. Swearing came once more into faſhion, for which a new evidence office was erected at Whitehall. But whereas the witneſſes of the popiſh plot were brow beaten and diſcouraged; thoſe of the proteſtant plot were highly encouraged; and, inſtead of judges and juries that might perhaps boggle at half-evidence, as it fell out in proſecution of the former, care was taken in this to pick out ſuch as would ſtick at nothing that would ſerve a turn. It was by ſuch judges and juries that the lord Ruſſel and Mr Sidney fell; and the cutting off thoſe two noble lives may be reckoned among the firſt triumphs of the duke's party in England.'

This matter might have been entirely omitted, but that ſeveral valuable perſons were perſecuted and ſuffered in Scotland for this pretended conſpiracy. It is certain that ſeveral patriots for religion and liberty in both nations had frequent meetings among themſelves, in order to conſult upon proper meaſures for ſecuring theſe invaluable privileges which were then at the ſtake. But that ever lord Ruſſel, col. Algernon Sidney, the earl of Argyll, the laird of Jerviſwood, the Rev. Mr William Carſtairs, and others ſuſpected, were concerned in any aſſaſſinating deſign, was never proved againſt them, nor could be. They were perſons of quite different principles, as will afterwards appear. When this conſpiracy was pretended to be diſcovered, a letter came from the king, requiring that none might be ſuffered to depart the kingdom without leave; and the council ſoon after iſſued a proclamation in the terms of the king's letter, and another againſt the duke of Buccleugh and Monmouth. In the Engliſh declaration for a thankſgiving, it is ſaid, that a general inſurrection was intended, and that a correſpondence was eſtabliſhed in Scotland; and that the earl of Argyll, lord Melvil, Sir John Cochran, Mr Will. Carſtairs and others, were concerned in it. It is not worth while to mention the Scots proclamation for a thankſgiving, only that it is entitled, 'Proclamation inviting a thankſgiving for the deliverance from the fanatical conſpiracy;' and that fanatical, the term of reproach given to Preſbyterians, is in the body of the proclamation, joined with atheiſtical and republican principles, and named firſt, as if, in the ſenſe of the compilers, it was the worſt of the three. The executions in England on this account, as that of lord Ruſſel, col. Algernon Sidney, &c. are out of my way. Only I cannot but obſerve, that all the violent meaſures then purſued were the effects of the malicious jealouſy of the duke of York, againſt his rival the duke of Monmouth and his friends, ſo that for ſome time the latter was forced to keep out of the way. But paſſing theſe things, I return to what more immediately concerns this hiſtory.

On the 4th of June the council iſſued a proclamation forbidding all to exerciſe the offices of teachers, pedagogues, or chaplains, unleſs they take the teſt. If noblemen did encourage them, they were to be fined in 3000 merks, gentlemen in 1200 merks, burgeſſes and others in 600 merks. The ſame day they appointed the laird of Claverhouſe, Meldrum, &c. to attend the juſtices at the circuits, to anſwer what queſtions ſhall be aſked, and give all the informations they can againſt the rebels, &c.

Next day the circuit ſat down at Stirling, when, among others, one William Johnſtoun, a Stirlingſhire man, appeared before them. The wounds he had received at Bothwell had for a long time deprived him of his reaſon, ſo that he had been overlooked till now. He and the reſt ſwore the teſt on their knees, but he knew not what he did; for when he was told that he had renounced what he had owned at Bothwell, he relapſed into his former diſtemper, and died in a few days.

About the beginning of this month, as a party of ſoldiers was carrying one Alexander Smith to Edinburgh, they were attacked by ſome of his friends near Inch-belly-bridge. The ſoldiers were beat, one of them was killed, and the priſoner releaſed. The country men retired in good order with their friend; but within a little the ſoldiers rallied, and ſearching the adjacent places, happened to ſeize John Wharry or MacWharry, and James Smith, while ſitting together in a wood near the place, without arms but their ſtaves. The poor men were immediately carried to Glaſgow. Some ſay two of the ſoldiers were ſuborned to ſwear that they ſaw them kill the ſoldier; but it appears that no witneſſes were examined, the court ſuſtaining it as relevant that they were taken near the place; whereas, had they been any ways concerned, they doubtleſs would have retired with the reſt. They were condemned to have their right hands cut off, then to be hanged, and their bodies to hang in chains at Inchbelly bridge. And accordingly, on the 13th of June, they were both executed at Glaſgow. The Cloud of Witneſſes ſays they ſuffered on the 11th. They were moſt pious and religious perſons; and the letters they wrote to their friends on this occaſion breathe an uncommon ſpirit of piety. They rejoiced in their bonds, and joyed in their tribulations. When John Wharry's hand was cut off, inſtead of ſhrinking, he held up the ſtump and ſaid, This, and other bloodſhed through Scotland, will yet raiſe the burnt covenants.

The day they were executed the circuit ſat down at Glaſgow, and there appeared at the bar John Ruſſel portioner in Eaſtfield, Gavin Paterſon feuar in Bothwellſhiels, Robert Ruſſel in Windyedge, Mr Thomas Hamilton of Raith, and James Hamilton of Parkhead. The moſt that was proved againſt them was, that they were ſeen in company with the rebels; but there were not two witneſſes that agreed in the ſame thing, except as to Raith and Parkhead, and both ſwore that they were without arms; and yet they were all condemned to be executed when the council and juſticiary ſhould think fit. We ſhall meet with ſeveral of them next year.

On the 15th the circuit proceeded againſt James Maxwell of Williamwood, and John Maxwell younger of Bogtoun, both in the pariſh of Cathcart in the ſhire of Renfrew. They were in abſence both forfeited in life and fortune, though there was no proof of their being at Bothwell.

Mr Maxwell of Williamwood was an uncommon ſufferer by the Highland hoſt 1678. And, in the following ſummer, a party, commanded by one Scot of Bonnitoun, came, and without producing any orders, carried off 50 bolls of meal, 4 horſes, with the whole houſhold furniture left by the Highlanders, cut the beds with their ſwords, and damaged what they could not carry off. All this was occaſioned by an information given by Mr Finnick the curate of Cathcart. However, Williamwood, conſcious of his integrity and loyalty, furniſhed his houſe anew, and dwelt in it, till in May or June 1680, a falſe information was given againſt him as having been at Bothwell; whereupon he was ſeized, and carried firſt to Glaſgow, and then to Edinburgh, where he was ſeveral times before the council; and no proof appearing of his being at Bothwell, he was releaſed upon bond to appear on the firſt of September. In ſhort, he got up this bond, and obtained his liberty: but, notwithſtanding this, about the end of 1681, he was again attacked, and had his houſe pillaged by ſoldiers; ſo that, finding, there was no ſafety for him from the malice of the ſaid Finnick, he let out his land to tenants, and lived privately for ſome time, and at laſt retired to Ireland. While there, a ſummons was left at his houſe in Scotland, to appear before the juſticiary. Montgomery the ſheriff depute, dealt with ſeveral perſons who were in the porteous roll to ſwear that they ſaw Williamwood at Bothwell, promiſing that he would get them acquitted, and their names ſcratched out of the roll; but they would not purchaſe their liberty at ſuch a price. However, one Hart a profligate wretch, and another like him, were prevailed with; and ſo William wood was ſentenced, as above, before ever he knew there was an indictment formed againſt him, and his eſtate given to provoſt Johnſtoun of Glaſgow, and his wife and ſix ſmall children put to ſhift for bread till the happy revolution. In the year 1684, his wife was haraſſed from place to place, till, through toil and grief, ſhe died in November. Theſe well atteſted facts will doubtleſs furniſh the reader with proper reflections.

Many other gentlemen received indictments before this court at Glaſgow, particularly James Muirhead of Bradiſholm. He was a great favourer of the preſbyterians; but though his houſe was within two miles of Bothwell, yet during that riſing, he retired from home ſeveral weeks. In the year 1681, he was proſecuted before the circuits; but no proof appearing, all proſecution was diſcharged. When he was, as he thought ſecure, he was again put into the porteous roll, and received a new indictment before this circuit court at Glaſgow; but nothing appearing againſt him, he was referred to the juſticiary at Edinburgh, and by their order was releaſed. Notwithſtanding this, he was, the very next year, put into the porteous-roll, and indicted before the circuit for the ſame pretended acceſſion to Bothwell; and becauſe he would not clear himſelf by taking the teſt, he was charged before the council for reſet and converſe, keeping conventicles, and was fined in 4000 merks, and kept 14 months in priſon at Edinburgh.

In ſhort, the country was put to great trouble and vaſt expences at theſe circuits. It coſt John Ayton, Thomas Leiper, James Martinholm, Alexander Small, John Steil in Brekenridge, John Mack in Caldergreen, with ſeveral more who attended this court, above 200 merks each before they got home. Great ſums were likewiſe extorted from honeſt people to get free from ſitting on the juries. John Luke of Claythorn paid, at different times, near 50 l. ſterling. This was likewiſe the caſe of Andrew Gibſon, George Bogle, and others. Many conſiderable merchants in Glaſgow loſt a great deal of money to be freed from ſitting in theſe juries.

The circuit court ſat down at Ayr on the 22d of June. The curates in that ſhire, eſpecially Mr Abercrombie in Carrick, and Mr Joſeph Clelland in Dalſerf, ſignalized themſelves in procuring informations. Vaſt numbers were ſummoned out of every pariſh in the ſhire to give informations. The perſons informed againſt were charged to clear themſelves by taking the teſt. The recuſants were impriſoned, and they who did not appear were declared rebels, &c. The ſame day Mr Matthew Campbell of Waterſhaugh, Robert Lockhart of Bankhead, James Brown ſon to James Brown in Newmills, John Paterſon in Dandillan, Adam Reid in Mauchlin, John Wilſon in Lindſayhill, John Crawford of Torſhaw, Andrew Brown of Duncamzeaner, Mr John Halbert, col. John Burns, and Jam. MacNeilly of Auchnairn, were indicted for being in arms at Bothwell. They were all abſent except Bankhead and Andrew Brown, who confeſſed their guilt, offered to take the teſt, and threw themſelves on the king's mercy. Sentence was not pronounced againſt theſe two till the 2d of Auguſt, when they were condemned to be beheaded at the croſs of Edinburgh on the 9th; but it ſeems before that they were pardoned. All the reſt were, in abſence, ſentenced to be executed as traitors when apprehended.

John Cochran of Waterſide was, in abſence, forfeited for converſing with rebels. There were ſtrong ſuſpicions that the two witneſſes who depoſed againſt them were ſuborned.

William Boſwell, a young gentleman in the pariſh of Auchinleck, was obliged to take the teſt, and pay 1000 merks fine to preſerve his eſtate from forfeiture. All his crime was, that, when he happened to fall in with a company of men going to join the weſt-country army, he ſtopt his horſe to ſee them draw up.

William Torbran, late provoſt of Stranraer, was ſummoned before this circuit. This gentleman endured great hardſhips in the year 1679, ſo that he was obliged to retire to Ireland, where he was when ſummoned to appear. His lawyers, with difficulty, got 60 days allowed to cite him as one out of the kingdom. When theſe were expired ſentence of death was paſt upon him, though no crime was proved againſt him but his abſence and non-appearance; ſo that he was obliged to ſtay abroad till 1687, when he found his loſſes exceeding great.

The circuit next ſat down at Dumfries. In this diſtrict very few but papiſts, perſecutors, and their friends, eſcaped. They who had formerly ſigned the bond were here made uſe of as witneſſes, and were grievouſly haraſſed if they did not turn informers too. The taking of the teſt, which was preſſed with rigour, ſaved the lives of many. They who did not appear were declared traitors, and all who after that converſed with them, whether father, mother, brother, ſiſter, huſband or wife, became in law as guilty as they; and thus the very ties of nature were broken.

In conſequence of what paſſed at the circuit at Jedburgh many were made priſoners. All who refuſed the teſt were bound over to appear at Edinburgh the 2d of Auguſt. Mr Gladſtanes, one of the priſoners, ſays, in a letter to the laird of Cavers, 'That Stevenſon, Ormiſtoun, Mindſley, Pollock, Maxwell, Greenock, and Blackcaſtle, were ſent to the caſtle of Edinburgh, Sir John Riddel, and another to the priſon of Haddington and Bonjedburgh, William Ker uncle to Greenhead, Gideon Scot, and himſelf, to that of Edinburgh, where, with about 60 other gentlemen, they remained about ten days, till the priſon—became dangerous for their health.' Some of theſe priſoners were releaſed upon bail to appear when called, others continued in priſon for a conſiderable time. Thus much for the circuits this year. After they were over, droves of priſoners were carried from priſon to priſon; and, if I may uſe the expreſſion, the jail at Edinburgh was the common reſervoir. The papiſts, all this while, were not only overlooked, but encouraged.

It has been related, that others were impowered to hold courts and tender the teſt, and they generally exceeded their inſtructions. Hallyards, and one Duncan Grant a ſoldier, with powers from him, held courts in the pariſh of Kilbride, and neighbouring pariſhes, in the ſhire of Lanerk. Grant was a terror to that part of the country: all ſuſpected perſons were fined as he thought fit. John Wilſon in Highſleet had his houſe rifled, and loſt 67 l. 6 s. 8 d. Grant ſent his ſoldiers upon free quarter in the pariſh, ſometimes to one houſe, and ſometimes to another. It was dreadful for the country to be oppreſſed, not only by the commiſſioners, but alſo by their wretched deputes, who acted without controul. The fines impoſed by Hallyards in the pariſh of Kilbride came to a great ſum, not to ſpeak of the damages done by the ſoldiers. John Watt in that pariſh loſt above 500 merks, and John Granger 1100. Creichton, and others of the orthodox clergy, conſtantly attended at theſe courts. In the pariſh of Evandale, the laird of Netherfield, Alexander Muir in Ploughland, Alexander Hamilton in Halls, and three or four more, were impriſoned for alledged reſet and converſe, and fined in 953 l. 13 s. 4 d. The ſheriffs and their deputes took care to have their ſhare of the fines.

Cornet Graham held his courts in Balmaghie, and the laird of Lagg acted with the utmoſt violence, as likewiſe did Thomas Lidderdale of St Mary iſle. The like courts were held at Kirkcudbright and Dumfries, where all whom they were pleaſed to ſuſpect were required to take the teſt, and the recuſants ſent to jail. It would be endleſs to mention particulars: however, I cannot omit one ſingular outrage committed at Moffat, which was within the commiſſion of the laird of Weſteraw. This wretch ordered intimation to be made in the church, on the Lord's day, that the teſt was to be offered to morrow in the pariſh, and ſummoned all the heads of families to appear. After this he openly ſaid, The devil damn his ſoul in hell, but before to-morrow's night they ſhould be all damned as well as he.

I might here likewiſe mention, that another branch of oppreſſion, at this time, was owing to thoſe who had gifts of the fines made to them; for many were forced to leave their houſes, and were reduced to great ſtraits, by the mercileſs exaction of theſe fines: but I paſs all theſe over, and go on to other things in the order of time.

On the 12th of July, Andrew Guillan, a weaver near Magus-muir (but after Sharp's death was obliged to abſcond, ſcond, and ſerve at ſome diſtance from where he lived formerly) was before the lords of juſticiary for the death of the archbiſhop of St. Andrews; and he was the only perſon that may be ſaid to have ſuffered preciſely on that ſcore. On the 11th of June laſt the curate of the pariſh came by, while he was at work with a country man, and aſked him whether he kept the church. Andrew told him he did not own him, nor would give him any account; whereupon the curate called the neighbours and ſeized him. Then he was carried to Cockpen, and preſſed to drink the king's health; and, upon refuſing, was committed to priſon at Dalkeith, and from thence to Edinburgh, where he was put in the iron houſe. At one of his examinations, (for there was no proof of his being any ways concerned in the affair of Sharp) while the advocate was expatiating on the aggravating circumſtances of that affair, and, among other things, was repreſenting, that when the biſhop was upon his knees praying, they killed him; Andrew being touched at this, lifted up his hands, and cried out, O! dreadful! he would not pray one word, for all that could be ſaid to him. This was enough. His own confeſſion was brought as proof of his being concerned in the biſhop's death, and accordingly he was ſentenced to be taken to the croſs of Edinburgh on Friday, July the 20th, to have both his hands cut off at the foot of the gallows, and then to be hanged, his head to be cut off, and fixed at Coupar, and his body to be hung in chains at Magus-muir. He endured his ſufferings with great courage. The hangman, being drunk, or affecting to be ſo, gave him nine ſtrokes in the cutting off his hands, which he endured with invincible patience. When his right hand was cut off, he held up the ſtump before the ſpectators, and ſaid, My bleſſed Lord ſealed my ſalvation with his blood, and I am honoured this day, to ſeal his truths with my blood. After his body had hung for ſome time in chains, ſome people came and took it down, which expoſed that part of the country to no ſmall trouble. In his laſt teſtimony, where are many excellent advices, among other things, he ſays, 'I declare I die not as a murderer, or as an evil doer, although this covenant breaking, perjured, murdering generation lay it to my charge, as though I was a murderer, on account of the juſtice that was executed on that Judas, who ſold the kirk of Scotland for 50,000 merks a year.'——

Edward Aitkin was condemned and executed at the ſame time with Andrew Guillan. His crime was converſing with the earl of Earlſtoun, which he acknowleged, and bleſſed God for the converſe he had with him. Hard meaſure with a witneſs!

On the 18th of July, Sir Thomas Hope of Graighall, Sheene of Hallyards elder, Holburn of Menſtrie, and other gentlemen, were indicted before the juſticiary for reſet and converſe, but were diſmiſſed upon taking the teſt.

On the 23d the Rev. Mr William Carſtairs was apprehended in England, at Kenterden in Kent on ſuſpicion that he was Mr Ferguſon, one of the ſuppoſed conſpirators. He was admitted to bail for ſome days, after which he was committed to the common jail of the place. All he was accuſed of was his refuſing the oaths, one of which had been expired by law, viz. the Oxford oath. After he had been there a fortnight, he was ſent to London and committed for two days into a meſſenger's hands. During which time Sir Andrew Forreſter came to him in the king's name, and offered him a pardon, and all kindneſs, if he would diſcover what he knew of that matter, which, ſays Mr Carſtairs, ſhews the falſhood of what was poſitively aſſerted, in an account given in the name of the king and duke of York, that never any hopes of favour were offered to any to induce them to confeſs. He was afterwards called before a committee of the council, and not giving them that ſatisfaction they deſired, was committed to the gate-houſe. He had for his fellow priſoner major Holmes, who had been a friend and correſpondent of the earl of Argyll, and to whom he was deſired to give a cypher of names to correſpond with, and to which he added ſeveral with his own hand, which was well known to the earl of Melford. This proved afterwards prejudicial to him, for it was found among his papers when he was ſeized. Beſides, the major told the lords of council that there had been ſome conſultations about lending money to Argyll. He continued in the gate-houſe eleven weeks cloſe priſoner; and, thinking himſelf ſecure againſt being ſent to Scotland, under the protection of the habeas corpus act, in the firſt of Michaelmas-term he petitioned the court of King's-bench for either being brought to his trial or admitted to bail; but, the day after that, he was ordered to prepare for Scotland in 24 hours, to be tried there for crimes committed in that kingdom, though for ſeveral years he had not been in that country but en paſſant. Accordingly he was ſent to Scotland in the king's kitchen yacht, with ſeveral other Scots gentlemen, and was with them committed to the jail of Edinburgh, where he was cloſe priſoner for ſeveral months, and where I muſt leave him in order to relate what happened in the mean time.

On the 24th Robert Hamilton laird of Monkland was proſecuted before the juſticiary, and indicted 'for being 'with four ſervants at Schaw-muir in June 1679. keeping a council of war with the murderers of the archbiſhop of St. Andrews, converſing with them, entertaining them at his houſe, and that he entertained and received rent from tenants after they had been at Bothwell.' This gentleman was what was then called regular, and had never given the leaſt evidence of what was accounted diſloyalty. While the weſt country army was near his houſe, and he was told that one of his children had ſtrayed towards them, he went out to bring back his child, which he thought was no crime; but, though nothing elſe appeared againſt him, he was ſentenced to be beheaded at the croſs of Edinburgh on the 10th of Auguſt next. And though the ſentence was not executed, yet the cruel treatment he met with bore ſo hard on his ſpirits, that he fell ſick and died, his ſon, at the revolution, was obliged to ſell the half of his eſtate.

On the 24th, 25th and 30th of this month the following perſons were impriſoned for alledged rebellion, reſet of rebels, and other treaſonable crimes, viz. John Porterfield of Douchal, James Hamilton of Aikenhead *, Mr Andrew Hay of Craignethan, William Brodie of Whelpſhill, John Gilkers heritor in Biggar, James Paterſon in Shields, J. July 30. John Peltin in Whitehill of Lesmahago, Archibald Crawford of Auchinmains, John Cannon of Headmark, James Galloway of Shields, Mr Will. Rankin late schoolmaster at Ayr, Tho' Mackenilly in Ochiltree, Jo Speir there, John Forrest in Langhouse in Carlouk, And. Prentice, David Dykes, And. Hutchison of Sorn, Dunlop of that ilk, Fergus MacRubben of Knockdallen, Fullertoun of that ilk, David Boswell of Auchinleck, Geo. Fullertoun of Dreghorn, And. Ramsay baker in Ayr, Dav. Blail of Adamtoun *, Jo Smith of Rodaindykes, Jo. Ramsay, Sir David Carmichael of Mauldsley *, and Walter Lockhart of Kirktoun.

These with [*] at their names, and a good many others, were released before the 22d of August, against whom nothing could be proved. Others gave bond to appear when called. Vast numbers escaped imprisonment by taking the test; but then there were not a few that were declared fugitives and outlaws by the justiciary on the said 25th of July, as W. Thomson procurator in Lanerk, Gideon Crawford merchant in Biggar, Ja. Muirhead younger in Lanerk, Jo. Clelland portioner in Stane, Ja. Thomson of Harestacks, Jo. Browning there, David Gilkerson, Hum. Stevenson, James Forrest, Alex. Smith, John Scot, John Nasmith in Clelands, John Nasmith in Hamilton, Will. Bell, Jo. Simpson, Arch. Scot, Jo. Marshall of Chapel, Rob. Murray, Tho. Allan and Jo. Marshall in Kilsyth. How happy were the days when such numbers tasted the sweets of imprisonment, and the pleasures of outlawry!

The circuit courts being over for this time, so many things were referred to the council that they gave a new commission, on the 28th of July, to John Boyle of Kelburn, Ardmillan, colonel Buchan, &c. to hold courts for inquiring after those who were suspected as guilty of rebellion, or reset of rebels, or who maliciously slandered such as testified their loyalty by taking the test.

The same day Mess. MacGilligen, Philip and Spreul were ordered to be sent from the prison of Edinburgh to the Bass; and the governor of the Bass was enjoined to suffer no man servant to wait on the prisoners, to inspect all letters and papers sent to or from the prisoners, to suffer only two at a time to have the benefit of walking above the prison walls, between the rising and setting of the sun, and only two to come at a time from the shore to the prisoners, and always some to be present to hear their discourse.

The Rev. Mr James Fraser of Brae was seized at London, in this month of July, upon the breaking out of the plot, and soon after was brought before the king and the duke of York. After he had satisfied them as to his knowing nothing of the plot, the king asked him what he thought of the archbishop of St. Andrew's murder. He answered he had no hand in it, nor was accessory to it, yea, he was grieved when he heard of it; and, as he would not justify or have had a hand in it for the world, so for him to condemn it, or declare it murder, was what he could not do; that so he was a doer of the law, and not a judge; and as to his inward sentiments, he desired to be excused, not being free to give an account of his thoughts before any human judicatory, who were only judges of mens words and actions. The king next asked him concerning the obligation of the covenants; to which Mr Fraser replied, That though he had never taken the covenants, yet he looked upon himself as bound to all in them of a moral import. Though the king seemed to be satisfied with his having no concern in the plot, yet he was remitted to the lord mayor, who asked him if he would take the oaths. He declared he was willing to take the oath of allegiance, but demurred on that of the supremacy, and absolutely refused the Oxford oath; whereupon he was sent to Newgate, where he continued six months, and had such good entertainment, company and conversation, that he says he could scarce call it suffering. And indeed there was a great difference between the sufferers in England and those in Scotland, where the managers were acted from a real spirit of cruelty.

On the 2d of August, Mess. Anthony Schaw, John Veitch, Rob. Millar, John Campbell, Rob. Boyd, Will. Baily, and James Veitch, indulged ministers, were charged with treasonable crimes. The two first were ordered to be imprisoned in Edinburgh. The process against the rest was delayed. We shall meet with most of them next year. On the 8th William Muir laird of Glanderstoun, who had been with others imprisoned on the 25th of July last, was released by an act of the justiciary. His case was singular. When he was in a fever he was bled by Mr Spreul, an apothecary, who was a non conformist. This was constructed converse with rebels; and for this Glanderstoun was imprisoned. He was obliged first to petition the council, for the justiciary at this time, was entirely under their direction. On the 16th the council ordered the king's advocate to raise a process of treason against the earl of Loudon, lord Melvil, Sir John Cochran of Ochiltree and his son John, Sir Hugh Campbell of Cessock elder,—Cambell of Cessock younger, the lairds of Roullan elder and younger,—Montgomery of Langshaw,—Fairly of Bruntsfield,—bailie of Jerviswood,—Crawford younger of Crawfordland,—Stuart of Culmess, and—Denholm of West-shiels. This process was raised on account of the plot; but it was some time before it was brought to any thing. And on the same 16th of August, the council had a letter from his majesty, thanking them for their care of the orthodox clergy, and declaring that it was his pleasure they should pursue the same wholesome methods. This was no doubt acceptable; for on the 21st they wrote to the king desiring that they might be impowered to nominate the justices of peace, in any of the shires, as they shall see needful, and that as several had lost the opportunity of taking the test before the first of August, they might have a farther opportunity, and that the king would approve of what they had done, in impowering proper persons to examine witnesses in the country; in regard to persons suspected of the rebellion, or guilty of reset and converse with rebels. In short, the king granted all their desires, and they issued a proclamation, ordering the common people to take the test by the first of March next, in order to indemnify them for ever, as to their receiving, or conversing with such as were in the rebellion 1679, except those who have received, or conversed with the murderers of the late archbishop, or seditious field-preachers, or who were any ways accessory to the late conspiracy. This they reckoned a great instance of clemency. But when perjury was the condition of their clemency, one would be ready to apply to them that saying, 'The tender mercies of the wicked are cruel.' Besides the taking of the test, according to the proclamation, secured the lives, but not the estates of such gentlemen as they could have an accusation against.

By this time Mr Alex. Gordon of Earlstoun was come to Scotland, and had been several times examined by the council, and by committees of their number. His answers were open and sincere; but, after all their endeavours, they could find nothing relative to the plot. But, having been formerly forfeited in life and fortune, the justiciary, on the 21st of August, condemned him to be beheaded at the cross of Edinburgh on the 28th of next month. But, still hoping to make great discoveries, they were resolved to examine him by torture; but here lay their difficulty: they wanted some point of law for torturing one under sentence of death. Accordingly the same day they wrote to the secretary to advise with the king's advocate, then at London, 'whether, by the laws of the kingdom, and the circumstances he is in, being under sentence of death, he may be put to the question by torture, upon such pertinent questions as your lordship and he shall think fit to draw up, &c.

Mean while, this same day, the lady Morisoun, a pious gentlewoman, was ordered to leave the kingdom, without having any thing to lay to her charge.

On the 29th of August, Mr J. Dick son to D. Dick writer in Edinburgh, having been apprehended upon the information of a poor woman whom they had bribed, was examined by the committee for public affairs, and in his answers exceeded the bishop in point of argument. On the last of August he was brought before the council, and subscribed what he had confessed upon his examination, viz. 'That he owned the work of reformation, as—contained in the confession of faith and catechisms conform form to the covenant againſt popery, prelacy, eraſtianiſm, &c.—As to epiſcopacy, he cannot underſtand it to be lawful,—that epiſcopacy and eraſtianiſm, eſtabliſhed in that and ſubſequent parliaments, were contrary to the word of God, and that the ſupremacy therein eſtabliſhed was moſt horrid blaſphemy.' Then, directing himſelf to the chancellor, he ſaid, he hoped his lordſhip would not take that ill, ſeeing he had ſworn the ſame in the teſt, and deſired that this might be added to his confeſſion, but that was refuſed. 'He did not own the Sanquhar declaration, but owned the Hamilton, the lawfulneſs of ſelf defence, field-meetings, and that the invaſion made againſt them at Pentland and Bothwell, they being in the exerciſe of religion, was ſervice done to the devil, and that the reſiſtance they made in their own defence was ſervice done to God.—He confeſſed his being at Bothwell, but not at Drumclog, that the king was lawful born king, and came lawfully to the crown, and owned his authority conform to the word of God,—that the covenants were binding on the nations, and ſhould be ſo to the end of time, and that that oath called the teſt, was a moſt horrid and unlawful oath, and that he was not obliged to take the ſame. As to the killing of the archbiſhop, that he could not give his judgment about it, it not being an act of his own; but that ſome of thoſe who were called the actors, whom he knew, were holy and juſt men.' The council, when he ſigned the confeſſion failed not to improve it; and accordingly ordered George Bannerman advocate to proſecute him and George Lapſley before the lords of juſticiary.

Thus on the 4th of September they were brought before the criminal court, and indicted for treaſon. Mr Dick's confeſſion was produced as evidence againſt him; he owned it in the face of the court; and, being aſked if he had any thing to add to it, he anſwered, 'he had on ly one clauſe, viz. that he was of opinion, that all the blood of the preſbyterians ſhed thoſe years bygone, merely for their principles, was murder.' The lords would not hear what he had to ſay in his own defence; the jury brought him in guilty; and he was ſentenced to be hanged at the Graſs market on September 18th. When the ſentence was pronounced he told them, 'That to paſs ſuch a ſentence upon him, without hearing him in his own defence, was a practice never paralelled among the heathens.' And going on he was interupted and carried off. But an incident happened which prevented his execution at this time, which I ſhall preſently relate.

George Lapſley was for ſome time a miller in Linlithgow mill, and was one of thoſe multitudes who was converted by the goſpel preached in the fields. At Bothwell he was wounded in the leg, and made priſoner. When before a committee of the council, he diſcovered, by his anſwers, that he was a man of undaunted courage and reſolution. As he was called before them he was reading his Bible, and carried it with him under his arm. Biſhop Paterſon was the firſt that attacked him, and aſked if he thought Bothwell bridge rebellion; he anſwered, Sir, you are a perjured prelate, I will anſwer you no queſtions. The other lords examined him in the manner following:

Queſtion. Wherefore are you in priſon? Anſwer. For hearing the goſpel. Q. Do you go to church? A. No. Q. Wherefore? A. Becauſe they are not the ſent miniſters of Chriſt, and becauſe of their perjury. Q. Will you own the king's authority? A. According to the word of God and covenants, and no otherwiſe, which you have broken and burnt, and for which the Lord will be avenged. Q. Did you write to Mr Dick? A. Yes. Q. Who wrote the letter? A. I will give no account. Q. Was the biſhop's death murder? A. I am not concerned with his life or death either. Q. Was Hackſtoun's death a murder? A. Yes; and all thoſe whoſe lives you have taken theſe two and twenty years. Q. Was you at Bothwell bridge? A. I will not accuſe myſelf. Q. What thought you of it? A. I thought it duty and not rebellion, and all that were on the contrary party were in rebellion againſt God, and that you will find. Q. Did you converſe with Mr Welſh? A. Yes; and I bleſs God for it. Q. What book is that under your arm? A. It is the acts of the parliament of heaven, and I charge you, as ye ſhall anſwer at the great day, when ye and I ſhall ſtand on equal terms, that ye judge according to what is contained in it. Q. Is it lawful to reſiſt the king's forces at the field meetings? A. Yes; the law of nature allows ſelf defence, and the word of God, and our covenants, to ſtand to the defence of one another.

Notwithſtanding theſe bold anſwers, they were reſtrained from paſſing ſentence of death, and he eſcaped before they had another opportunity, and lived a merchant in Edinburgh for many years after the revolution.

On the 12th of September garriſons were appointed in Dumfries, Kaitloch, Earlſtoun, &c. which effectually carried on the perſecution againſt all non conformiſts.

Four days after this Mr John Dick, George Lapſley, and 24 more, made their eſcape out of the priſon at Edinburgh; for which the magiſtrates were called to an account, reprimanded, and enjoined to be more careful for the future. Mr Dick was afterwards taken and executed.

On the 19th the council had a letter from the king, ordering the fugitive rolls to be printed; and the next day a letter came from Middleton the ſecretary, to the chancellor, relating to the torture of the laird of Earlſtoun, in which it was declared, that though a man cannot be tortured on queſtions relating to the crimes for which he is condemned, yet he may be tortured for what relates to plots, conſpiracies, and combinations, that have happened afterwards; and ſince Mr Gordon had a commiſſion from the rebels, and it doth appear from a letter to him, from I. N. dated at London, March the 20th laſt, that he was privy to the late conſpiracy, &c. therefore his majeſty reſolved that he be put to the torture and interrogated concerning thoſe from whom he had the ſaid commiſſion, and concerning the ſaid conſpiracy. In conſequence of this, the council, the ſame day, appointed a committee to meet next Tueſday, and examine Earlſtoun by torture.

Accordingly, on the 25th of September, Earlſtoun was before them; but though the inſtrument of torture was ſtanding by, yet it was not uſed, becauſe he declared he would be as ingenious, and more full than he could be in torture. There were two things upon which he was chiefly examined, viz. the commiſſion from the ſocieties, called in the interrogatories the Pretended Convention, and the letter ſigned I. N. As to the firſt, he declared, 'That the firſt time he met with that pretended convention was near the Inner kirk of Kyle in the fields, about two years ago, and that there were about 80 perſons, or thereby; and that he was brought there, from his own houſe, by one John Niſbet, whom the declarant knows no farther than that he is a weſt country man about Glaſgow, and that John Niſbet is another John Niſbet that wrote a letter to him to Holland, under the notion of trade, relating to the riſing and rebellion in England. And farther, that, about a year and half ago, he met with another convention, conſiſting of fourſcore perſons, or thereby, in the fields, within five miles of the former place near Innerkirk, and that very few of them had ſwords; to which meeting he was advertiſed to come by a letter ſent to his houſe, ſubſcribed by Mr James Renwick, who is clerk to the convention, and heard of no miniſters being among them at either of theſe times; and ſays there were people there from all the diſtricts in ſeveral ſhires of the kingdom; which diſtricts he was informed were fourſcore, and that in them all there would have been ſix or ſeven thouſand men; and he knew none of the perſons in either of their meetings, except Mr James Renwick the clerk, the ſaid John Niſbet, who came from a diſtrict beſide Galloway, and William and James Stuarts, who came out of Galloway, Robert Spier, who came from the Lothians, and one Forreſt, who came from the upper-ward of Clyde; and that, at theſe general meetings, they produced their commiſſions from the ſeveral diſtricts to the clerk, that it might appear that they were commiſſionate to get relief for the diſtreſs in their bounds; that the buſineſs of the convention was to provide for thoſe among them that were in want, and for their own ſecurity againſt the dangers they were in, being denounced fugitives from the laws, and in hazard to be catched by the governors; and that he heard nothing treated of, or ſpoke amongſt them, as to riſing in arms, nor knows of any correſpondence ence these of the convention had with any in Ireland; and as to England, he supposed there was a correspondence there, but knows not those that managed it, except the said John Nisbet, he having shewn the declarant a letter he had from Michael Shiells, one of the clerks of the convention, which he saw in the end of March, or beginning of April last,—that he accepted the commission, to see if there could be a way found for the distrest brethren to go abroad, or to have something from abroad to maintain them there,—that the commission was sent him to Newcastle by a common receiver, whom he knows not, directed to him at his lodging, at the sign of the vine in the Gateside in Newcastle, his landlord's name being George Marshall a public inn-keeper, and addressed to him under the name of la Graveil, &c.'

As to the letter from I. N. he explained all the parts of it as they required, as the reader may see in the copies of informations by Sprat, and no farther could appear from his declaration than that there had been conferences among those who wished well to their country, about the most proper methods for rescuing it from approaching slavery, and consultations about rising in arms; but nothing of assassinating either the king or the duke. To use the words of a modern historian, 'There was nothing more in it, than the rash and imprudent discourse of some warm Whigs, which, in so critical and dangerous a conjuncture, was very hazardous; but no scheme of a plot was agreed upon, no preparations were made, no arms nor horses bought, nor persons appointed to execute any design against the king or government.'

Notwithstanding Earlstoun had been most open and full in his declarations, yet, in less than two months after this, he was, in consequence of a new letter from the king, ordered to be put to the torture; but, as I am assured by his son, when they were going to put him in the boots, he turned furious, and frighted the whole court; and that this, and the interest of the duke of Gordon, who was his firm friend, were the occasions of his life being preserved. The physicians advised that he might be sent to the castle for the benefit of the air. He perfectly recovered in eight or ten days. In short, this worthy gentleman was reprieved from time to time, and was at last sent to the Bass, where he had sometimes more, and sometimes less liberty, with his excellent lady, till he was released by the revolution.

Some time in September Mr James Renwick returned to Scotland. After his ordination he went with all expedition to Rotterdam to take the first opportunity of a ship. It was some time before he found a conveniency; at last he got a-board a vessel for Ireland. While at sea they were overtaken by a storm, and forced to put in at Rye harbour in England, which happened during the noise of the plot; but getting off he arrived at Dublin, and from thence sailed to Scotland, where he joined the societies, who chuse him for their minister. His first public meeting was in a moss at Darmead, where, for his own vindication, and the satisfaction of the people, he declared all his sentiments about the then puzzling questions, particularly concerning the defections of ministers, and shewed what ministers he would and what he would not join with; and, as he named the latter, he gave his reasons why he could not join with them. Some present were offended at his naming some ministers, which when he came to understand, he wished he had not been so particular in mentioning names, since it had given offence; but he declared his end was harmless, and that it flowed from no prejudice at their persons, nor disrespect to their names. After this he was exposed to many slanders and reproaches, too numerous here to mention. And many sought to defame his principles, as not only unsound, but also pernicious; and I am sorry to have it to say, that none reproached him more than the indulged of his own communion.

In the mean time, by the noise that went to him through the country, the council soon got intelligence, and were galled at the thoughts of his preaching in the fields; which practice had been laid aside since Mr Cargill's execution; but was now revived by Mr Renwick notwithstanding the inevitable danger to which it exposed both him and his followers. But, considering the necessities of the people, who had been long without ordinances, and could not submit to the indulged, he engaged in the difficult work, and was heartily received by the poor persecuted people, who, for the sake of the gospel, were determined to venture their lives. The council soon began to shew their resentment; for, on the 8th of October, they fined the laird of Dundass and the trades of Glasgow in 50 l. sterl. each, because of a field meeting which Mr Renwick had preached to, and baptized several children at Brownridge belonging to Dundass's estate, and in the parish of New-Monkland belonging to the trades of Glasgow.

The same day Mr Tho. Hog and Mr Tho. Wilkie were fined for conventicles, the first in 5000, and the second in 10,000 merks. The former soon after went to Holland, and the latter seems to have been minister of the Canongate after the revolution.

Some time in this same month James Forrest in the parish of Cambuslethan, his son and his nephew Rob. Gourlay, were banished to West Flanders. But returning, he, his son, and daughter Margaret Forrest, were seized and banished, she to Jersey, and they to Jamaica, after a long imprisonment. The prisons, especially at Edinburgh, were crouded, and many of the prisoners were transported to the plantations for their non conformity, and alledged reset and converse. One William Inglis a mason was taken out of his bed, upon a bare information of his being a non conformist, and, after a long imprisonment, was sent to Carolina, where he died.

But the treatment of George Jackson, in the parish of Eastwood, shews the inhuman and bloody spirit of the prelates as much as any. While at Glasgow he was overheard at prayer, and immediately suspected for a presbyterian, and so was seized some time in this month of October. There was nothing they could lay to his charge. He was soon brought before the bishop of Glasgow who examined him as follows. Question. What now, Mr Jackson? Answer. I was never a scholar. Q. Can you read the Bible? A. Yes. Q. Was you at Bothwellbridge? A. Yes. Q. What arms had ye? A. An halbert staff? Q. Was ye an officer? A. No; I was but sixteen years of age. Q. Who was your captain? A. A young man. Q. How called they him? A. I am not bound to give an account to you. Q. Was you at Bothwell-rebellion? A. I allow myself in no rebellion against God. Q. Was it rebellion against the king, or not? A. I have answered that question already. Q. Would you go to it again? A. The question is like yourself. I know not. Q. Will you say, God save the king? A. It is not in my power to save or condemn. Q. Will ye pray for him? A. I will pray for all within the election of free grace. Q. Whether is the king within the election or not? A. If you were the man you profess to be, you would not ask such a question; it belongs only to God. Q. Do you own the authority as it is now established? A. No; but I own all authority so far as it is according to the written word of God. Q. Do you own the king and inferior magistrates? A. In so far as they are 'a terror to evil doers, and a praise to them that do well.' Q. Are they not that? A. When the Lord Jesus Christ shall sit judge, they and ye, and the like of you, will count for it, whether they be so or not. Q. Is the bishop's death murder, or not? A. If your questions be upon these matters I am not concerned with, I will keep silence.' He was then examined concerning some papers found about him, but declining to answer, the right reverend prelate mildly said, Sir, the boots shall make you free. He refused to subscribe what he had said, because he looked upon that as an acknowlegement of their unjust laws. In short, he was kept in irons all winter till the month of May, when we shall meet with him again.

In the beginning of November a party apprehended about 12 persons in the parish of New Monkland, and carried them to Hamilton, where they were increased to 30, and from thence carried them to Lanerk in the night-time, and cast them into a dungeon, where they were forced to stand the rest of the night, without meat, drink, fire or candle. Next day they were tied to one another, two and two, set on bare horses, with their legs tied under the horse's belly, to the effusion of their blood. In that posture they were were obliged to ride at the gallop for ſundry miles, without being allowed a refreſhment, though Bonſhaw and his ſoldiers ſtopt at moſt of the public houſes on the road. One of the poor priſoners begged leave to light and eaſe nature, but the cruel commander would not ſuffer it. When they got to Edinburgh, they were for ſome days neither able to walk, ſit, nor ſtand.

During theſe proceedings things were preparing for the trial of ſeveral in Scotland who were ſaid to be concerned in the plot. Accordingly, on the 22d of October, the Scots council at London ordered the laird of Caſnock and his ſon, Rowallan elder and younger, Crawfordland, Bruntſfield, Alex. Monro of Beaucrofts, Jerviſwood, Mr Will. Carſtairs, Hepburn ſon to major Hepburn, Spence ſervant to the earl of Ayrgil, priſoners at London, to be ſent to take their trial in Scotland; and, by a letter from the king, the advocate was ordered to proſecute them for treaſon. They were ſent down accordingly.

Mean while cruelty and injuſtice were riding in triumph in Scotland: for, on the 15th of November, Sir William Scot of Harden, a gentleman near 70 years of age, was fined in 1500 l. ſterling for his lady's withdrawing from the church. And, becauſe his confinement in priſon at Edinburgh, for near ſix months, was like to deſtroy his health, the council, out of their great clemency, ordered him to the caſtle. He was afterwards ſent to the jail of Jedburgh, and from thence to that of Edinburgh. He was releaſed it ſeems in Auguſt next year, upon Sir Patrick Scot of Ancrum's bail for 1500 l ſterling to preſent him the Tueſday following; and none of them appearing that day, the bond was declared forfeited

On the 28th John Whitelaw in New-Monkland in the ſhire of Lanerk, Arthur Bruce in Dalſerf and John Cochran ſhoemaker in Leſmahago, were indicted before the lords of juſticiary at Edinburgh for treaſon. They had nothing to lay to their charge, but the anſwers they gave to their enſnaring queſtions as in many former caſes, and yet they were condemned to be executed on the 30th. They were perſons from whom the government had nothing to fear; and nothing can be ſaid but that the managers thirſted after blood. The laſt mentioned had a wife and ſix ſmall children, whom he left to the protection of the Almighty, as he declared in his laſt teſtimony. They all died with a holy chearfulneſs, adhering to their covenanted principles, and bearing witneſs againſt popery, prelacy, and the teſt and every thing elſe contrary to the written word of God.

The ſame day theſe three were condemned, the general meeting of the united ſocieties drew up a proteſtation againſt the Scots congregation, miniſters and church ſeſſion at Roterdam, and ſent it to Mr Hamilton their agent. This action was very much condemned, and in their Informatory Vindication, they do not juſtify ſome expreſſions in it, though they own they had matter for a proteſtation. Thus they conclude, 'Conſidering that the cauſes inſerted, materially conſidered and rightly applied, are both true and ſufficient for a proteſtation, we deſire that it may be looked upon as a ſtanding teſtimony, (together with what contendings have formerly been by ſome faithful Scotiſh ſufferers in that land) for the vindication of truth, and againſt the ſad wrongs and abuſes in that congregation, ay and while the cauſes inſerted are maintained, and the offence and ſcandal given not removed. Yea, in very deed, a deep ſenſe, in the mean time, of the ſins witneſſed againſt by the foreſaid proteſtation, would make all therein involved more favourably and charitably to conſtruct of the action.'

On the 29th commiſſions were given to ſundry gentlemen, in ſeveral ſhires in the ſouth and eaſt, to attack heritors who had not given ſatisfaction with reſpect to their converſe with rebels.

During the months of October and November ſearches were common and ſevere, eſpecially in Glaſgow. All ſtrangers who did not anſwer their enſnaring queſtions were carried either to the guard or priſon. Multitudes were thus apprehended, and ſent to Edinburgh. One night they catched John Richmond as he was walking in the ſtreets, John Dick and John Williamſon. The firſt was carried to the guard, where he was moſt cruelly tied neck and heel, and left in that poſture bleeding of the wounds which he had received in making ſome reſiſtance when taken. He was executed, as we ſhall relate. The ſecond was baniſhed to Carolina, and the third made ſome compliances, of which he afterwards repented One John Main was alſo ſeized at this time in arms, and was likewiſe executed

On the 6th of December one Margaret Garnock, after about a year's impriſonment for pretended converſe with rebels, was releaſed.

Next day lord Livingſtone was, by the council, appointed proveſt of Linlitgow, in regard the former magiſtrates did not exerciſe their authority againſt church-diſorders; ſo that this town was deprived of its privileges, and were obliged, not only now, but alſo in the following infamous reign, to ſubmit to the nomination of magiſtrates made by the council.

As the proceſs againſt ſeveral gentlemen and others, at this time, before the juſticiary came to nothing, I purpoſely wave them. About 20 were ſummoned to appear on the 10th, and not appearing were declared fugitives, and put to the horn.

On the 18th a number of gentlemen were impriſoned for the ſame cauſe with thoſe in July; ſome of them it ſeems were papiſts, who were ſo honeſt as to refuſe the teſt; but, as I cannot diſtinguiſh the one from the other, I omit their names. However, the papiſts had little to fear under the preſent adminiſtration, ſince the reins of government were in the hands of their friend the duke of York. Theſe were ordered to the priſon of Edinburgh, with Sir John Riddel, John Maxwell of Gribtoun, Rob. Carliſle, James Lindſay, James Hume brother to Baffinden, Hugh Dumbar of Knockſhinnoch, and Rob Nisbet of Greenholm.

The ſame day about 30 perſons, moſtly tradeſmen and country people, were declared fugitives and ſeveral others denounced, and the magiſtrates of Edinburgh, to ſhew their zeal for prelacy, made an act againſt conventicles, by which they offered 60 l. Scots to the diſcoverer of any conventicle, unlawful baptiſm or marriage, or the entertainer of any intercommuned or vagrant perſon, and 12 l. Scots to ſuch as ſhould diſcover any perſon that kept not the church

Some time this month another general ſearch was made at Glaſgow when John Buchanan, a young ſtudent, was taken, and, after ſome time's impriſonment, was tranſported to Carolina.

James Dun in Beauwhat, in the pariſh of Dalmellingtoun, a pious man, ſuffered much in his family at this time. He had four ſons; one was killed, and another was baniſhed, and his youngeſt ſon Quintin, not quite 14 years of age, was apprehended and impriſoned at Ayr. Nothing could be laid to his charge. His father was forced to pay 240 l. Scots before he could get him releaſed. This was more than they could have got for him had they ſold him for a ſlave, as they afterwards did.

CHAP. IX.

Of the perſecution this year in general: the proceedings of the council and juſticiary: the ſufferings of particular noblemen, gentlemen and others; together with the public executions till the end of Auguſt 1684.

THE longer perſecution laſts the worſe it grows, one kind of oppreſſion making way for another, as appears from the preceding part of this work; but, this year and the following open a more bloody ſcene than any before, being, what the oppreſſed people juſtly called, Killing time.

The courts held by commiſſion in the former years increaſed their illegal ſeverities in this time; for, when they had nothing to accuſe perſons of ſince Bothwell, they went as far back as Pentland. The fines were exorbitant, and the curates egged on the oppreſſors. At one of theſe courts, held at Kirkcudbright, Mr Colin Dalgleiſh the curate cauſed almoſt the whole pariſh to be ſummoned, and excuſed or accuſed whom he pleaſed. Particularly, through his inſtigation, James Martin of Dularg was fined in 1000 l. Scots for his wife's not keeping the church, and caſt into priſon till he paid it; but, through bad uſage ſage and want of accommodation, he was ſeized with a cholic of which he died in priſon.

The teſt was impoſed with rigour at theſe courts upon all whom they ſuſpected, and the recuſants impriſoned. This made ſeveral take it contrary to their conſciences which afterwards filled them with dreadful remorſe. One William Spaldie, a taylor in Glaſgow, died in deſpair on this very account; for, when they ſpoke to him of the extenſiveneſs of the divine mercy, his anſwer was, Speak not of mercy to me, I have appealed unto God, and atteſted him to judge me, and he will do it. I have ſealed and ſigned my condemnation with my own hand. But I purpoſely omit other inſtances, which the reader will find in my author.

The quartering of ſoldiers for not paying the ceſs was another occaſion of great oppreſſion. The reaſons why many refuſed to pay this have been mentioned, ſoldiers were ſent to the recuſants, and quartered upon them till ten times the value of the ceſs was deſtroyed; and, after all, a compoſition was forced to be made with the collectors. Seven cows were taken from one Gavin MacLymont in the pariſh of Carſphairn, upon his refuſal, after the loſs he ſuſtained by quartering, though he was not charged above the value of 15 ſhillings ſterling.

Multitudes were baniſhed, many of whom never returned. I ſhall have occaſion to mention ſeveral of theſe afterwards in their proper place. Only here I would obſerve, that one John Gate was committed to priſon at Glaſgow, for modeſtly declining to drink the king's health; his wife was impriſoned in a different room in the ſame jail, where ſhe fell ſick; and though ſhe was with child, could not get out till a ſurgeon gave a certificate that her life was in danger; but, when ſhe was releaſed, ſhe was not ſuffered to go with her eight children to her own houſe; and the people being terrified at the dreadful proſecutions for reſet and converſe, would not take her in; ſo that ſhe was obliged to ly in the ſtreets, till the lady Ardry, notwithſtanding the hazard ſhe ran, gave her the conveniency of her brew-houſe, where three of her children died. Her huſband continued ſeveral months in irons, and was at laſt tranſported to America, where he died. She ſurvived her troubles, and was alive when my author wrote his hiſtory. George Ruſſel, in the pariſh of Cambuſnethan, was firſt impriſoned, and then ſent abroad to the army, where he died for the great crime of having a child baptized at a conventicle ſome years before.

This year the moſt unhuman practice of killing innocent people in cold blood, in the fields, began to be uſed, and public authority was given for it, as we ſhall relate in its proper place; but before that could be pretended it was put in practice. Accordingly, as one John Smith was returning from ſome meeting, he was taken ill, and ſat down in the fields. A party of ſoldiers coming that way, without any proceſs or ceremony, ſhot him where they found him.

The priſons were crouded, and many died there, particularly George Shiells, Thomas Scot in Bonnchester, John Falla in Kelſo, and Thomas Turnbull in Ancrum. But I ſhall now relate the moſt remarkable tranſactions of this year, as near as I can, in the order of time.

As fines were one of the ſore oppreſſions the country groaned under, ſo the moſt of theſe were ſquandered by the exactors, and a ſmall part of them was accounted for. But, on the 3d of January, a letter from the king was read in the council, and recorded, wherein his majeſty required them to call judges and magiſtrates to an account for what fines they received, and to purſue thoſe heritors who were fined and had not yet paid them, as they ſhould ſee proper. A committee was appointed to take this matter under conſideration, and agreed, that the heritors, who had not paid their fines, ſhould be charged to do it in 15 days; and that ſuch of them as applied for mitigation ſhould be heard before the council. Whether the council examined the magiſtrates, &c. as to the way the fines were diſpoſed of, is not recorded, farther than that it appeared, that the magiſtrates of Edinburgh had received 8349 l. 12 s. Scots, and were allowed 200 l. ſterl. for their charges, which was a tolerable good allowance, and would be very encouraging to other magiſtrates in their ſevere exactions.

The ſame day Mr John Campbell, indulged miniſter at Sorn, and Mr James Veitch at Maunchlin, were deprived of their licence, and ordered to find ſurety to leave the kingdom by the firſt of March, or to exerciſe no part of their miniſtry, becauſe they had preached in private families, and had not read the proclamation for the thankſgiving. Mr Veitch went to Holland where he continued till the toleration. The ſame day one John Millar of Waterſhaugh was releaſed, upon giving bond, under the penalty of 500 l. ſterl. to appear when called. He had been nine months in priſon, upon mere ſuſpicion of correſpondence with rebels as they were called. And,

At the ſame time, a new commiſſion was granted to the provoſt of Glaſgow, and others, for the ſhires of Lanerk and Dumbarton, and to the ſheriff-depute of Dumfries, and others, for Dumfries, Kirkcudbright, Wigtoun and Annandale, for judging thoſe who were or ſhould be apprehended for being in the late rebellion, or for juſtifying the ſame, or diſowning the king's authority. The like commiſſion was afterwards granted for Renfrew and Ayrſhire. If priſoners were ſilent, as to the queſtions propoſed to them, the commiſſioners were directed to delay proceeding againſt them to adminiſter the teſt to ſuch of them as deſired it, and to acquaint the council with their caſe, but to execute juſtice upon the guilty. The ſame orders were repeated to the juſtices of Dumfries, with this alteration, that when ſuch priſoners, againſt whom there is no proof, refuſed to anſwer, they were to be ſent to Edinburgh. In ſhort, the commiſſioners were afterwards impowered to act againſt thoſe who were without the bounds of their commiſſion. I ſhall only add here, that the laird of Meldrum got likewiſe a commiſſion for trying rebels in Lanerkſhire. We ſhall hear of ſeveral condemned at Glaſgow in conſequence of theſe commiſſions.

Mean while, on the 7th of January, Mr Anthony Schaw, indulged miniſter at Newmills, was indicted before the juſticiary at Edinburgh, for preaching at a field conventicle. The caſe was this: when aſſiſting the indulged miniſter at Colmonel, at the Lord's ſupper, the number of people was greater than the church could contain, ſo that Mr Schaw preached in a tent in the church yard, a thing very common in Scotland; for which crime this good man was tried for his life. However, the proceſs was dropt, on condition of his appearing before the council on the tenth. He appeared, his indulgence was taken from him and his church declared vacant, and he was not releaſed till bail was found that he ſhould no more exerciſe any part of his miniſtry. And indeed ſuch attacks as theſe were made on all the indulged. What then muſt have been the caſe of others?

I have had occaſion to relate the caſe of huſbands being fined for their wives non-conformity, and of the exorbitant fine impoſed on Sir William Scot of Harden, who, on the 22d preſented a petition to the council, deſiring ſome enlargement in priſon, where he was confined for the extravagant ſum impoſed upon him. The council, on the 23d, wrote to the king for his approbation of what they had done, in fining huſbands for their wives, and deſiring his majeſty would impower them to diſpenſe with the fines of loyal huſbands, who were no ways to be ſuſpected of connivance with their obſtinate wives, but were content to deliver them up to be puniſhed. The king granted their requeſt, and approved of what they had done.

There had, for ſome time, been a breach between the earls of Aberdeen and Queenſberry, who were of different ſentiments with reſpect to fining the huſbands liable to a fine, if their wives went to conventicles, for they had it in their power to reſtrain them: and, ſince the law provided in the one caſe, that the huſband ſhould ſuffer for his wife's fault, but had made no proviſion in the other caſe, as to their going to church, he thought, the fining them on that account could not be legally done. Lord Queenſberry was for every thing that would bring money into the treaſury: ſo, ſince in thoſe parts the ladies had for many years withdrawn from the churches, he reckoned the ſetting fines on their huſbands, to the rigour, would make all the eſtates of the country be at mercy.—The earl of Perth ſtruck in with this, and ſet it up for a maxim, him, that the presbyterians could not be governed but with the extremity of rigour, and that they were irrecon cilable enemies to the king and duke and therefore ought to be extirpated. The ministry being thus divided, they referred the decision to the king. And lord Perth went up to have his resolution. The king determined against the ladies, which was thought very indecent; for, in dubious cases, the nobleness of a prince's temper, should always turn him to the merciful side. This was the less expected from him, who had all his life time expressed as great a neglect of womens consciences, as esteem for their persons.'

But he was determined to it by the duke, who, since the breaking out of the plot, had got the whole management of affairs—into his hands. Scotland was so entirely in his dependence, that the king would seldom ask what the papers imported which the duke brought to be signed by him.—The breach grew so wide between Aberdeen and Queensbery, that both were called up to give an account of it. It ended in dismissing lord Aberdeen, and making lord Perth chancellor; to which, says Burnet, he had been long aspiring in a most indecent manner. He saw the duke's temper, that his spirit was turned to an unrelenting severity, as he shewed very indecently in Scotland. For, 'when any are to be struck in the boots, it is done in the presence of the council; and upon that occasion almost all offer to run away. The sight is so dreadful, that, without any order restraining such a number to stay, the board would be forsaken. But, when the duke was in Scotland, he was so far from withdrawing, that he looked on all the while with an unmoved indifference, and with an attention, as if he had been to look on some curious experiment. This gave a terrible idea of him to all that observed it, as of a man that had no bowels nor humanity in him. Lord Perth observing this, resolved to let him see how well qualified he was to be an inquisitor general; for as, in the court of inquisition, they do, upon suspicion, or, if a man refuses to answer upon oath, give him the torture, and repeat it and vary it as often as they think fit, and do not give over till they get out of their mangled prisoners what they have a mind to know, so lord Perth resolved to make this his pattern.'

While lord Perth was at London, bishop Leighton died at the Bell inn in Warwick-lane, after he had lived ten years in Sussex in great privacy, dividing his time wholly between study and retirement. He was certainly the best of all the Scots bishops, and no person can have a better character than what bishop Burnet gives him, who among other things, says, that he was, in his last years, turned to a greater severity against popery than he imagined a man of his temper, and of his largeness in point of opinion was capable of. While I am speaking of Leighton's death, I shall add, that Burnet archbishop of St. Andrews died sometime this year, of whom see vol. I. and was succeeded by Mr Arthur Ross archbishop of Glasgow. The bishop of Sarum says, that he was a poor, ignorant, worthless man, but in whom obedience and fury were so eminent, that these supplied all other defects. But to return,

On the 30th of January Mr William Eccles, indulged minister at Paisley, and Mr Robert Elliot at Lintoun, were deprived of their licences, and ordered to find bail, either not to preach, or leave the kingdom. They had broke their confinement, i. e. preached in other places besides their own parishes, and had not preached every 29th of May, Mr Thomas Black, indulged minister at Newtyle, being summoned, and not appearing, was declared rebel.

On the 12th of February Mr Ezekiel Montgomery, sheriff-depute of Renfrew, was ordered to be imprisoned for some pieces of misconduct in his office. The same day the council ordered the advocate to prosecute Sir Hugh Campbell of Cessnock for treason, and least Sir Hugh should have the benefit of Sir George Lockhart, they appointed that able lawyer to assist the king's advocate in the prosecution. However, Sir Hugh was permitted to have what other lawyers he pleased.

On the 18th George Martin, some time notary and leader in Dallay in the shire of Ayr, John Ker in Howmum, and James Muir at Cessford boat, were indicted before the justiciary at Edinburgh for treason and their confession, or answers to the usual questions, were produced as evidence against them. They confessed they did not own the king's authority as then established, nor account Bothwell rebellion, nor Sharp's death murder, &c. They were condemned to be hanged at the Grass market of Edinburgh on the 22d. The Cloud of witnesses speaks only of George Martin, and of one John Gilrey in the parish of Hownan in Teviotdale, who, my author thinks was the same with John Ker mentioned in the registers, and says he had two letters signed John Gilry, from the iron house, the 27th of December 1683, which breathe a spirit of humility, self diffidence and meekness. They all died with much composure and joy in the Lord. And it cannot but be a constant reproach to the managers at this time, that so many pious persons, whom God owned so signally at their death, were butchered and led to the slaughter for their principles, and because they could not, over the belly of conscience, express their loyalty and approbation of wicked rulers who had overturned the foundation of all legal government, and deprived the subjects of their religion and liberty.

George Martin had endured a long train of sufferings with great patience. He was apprehended about the end of the year 1679, so that he had been confined for near four years and four months, and for a considerable part of that time being in irons night and day, without fire and other necessaries. In his last testimony he gives the reasons of his conduct; and concerning praying God save the king, says among other things, 'Another reason why I cannot pray after such a manner is, I find, when prayers are rightly discharged, and seriously gone about, in the manner, time and place, as is warranted by the word of God, God is thereby worshipped and honoured; but if irreverently gone about he is dishonoured, and his name profaned and taken in vain, which is an abomination to him, and which he says his enemies do, and for which he will not hold them guiltless.—I dare not pray it, because all the profane and prosligate persons have it always in their mouth, especially when they are drunk.' He concludes his testimony with many serious and pertinent advices, which I cannot here insert.

On the 21st the council wrote to the secretary in favour of Mr Thomas Hamilton of Raith, who had in June last been forfeited in his life and fortune for alleged accession to Bothwell. In their letter, though they owned his loyalty, and that there were many favourable circumstances in his case, yet they asked for a pardon only with respect to his life, which was granted; but his estate, goods and chattles continued under forfeiture, though they could have nothing against him as acting contrary to their laws. I shall leave the reader to make his own reflections.

On the 4th of March James Forrest younger, John Colin, Joseph Gourly, Dennis Gilcreof, Thomas and George Jacksons, were banished, by the committee for public affairs, to West Flanders never to return on pain of death. In their testimony they vindicated themselves from the imputation of disloyalty and rebellion, and left their testimony for the Scriptures, confession and covenants, against popery, prelacy, &c. And particularly John Colin gives the reason why he could not say God save the king, because when he desired the committee to explain the meaning of the words, he was told that they imported an owning of his person and government, and the laws and present acting, which, said he, satisfied me much, and I think, no serious christian would approve those.

About the beginning of March Mr John Dick was again apprehended, and brought before the council, and upon his refusing to give an account of the manner of his escape, was referred to the justiciary, who, on the 4th, ordered him to be executed next day, which was done accordingly.

He wrote several pious letters to his friends before his execution. In that to his father he gives a most pointed account of the Lord's first effectual dealing with his soul, and concludes with these words, 'I hope ere long the copstone shall be put on, the result of which shall be praises and shouting to Him that sits upon the throne, and to the Lamb, throughout all the ages of eternity, of long lasting eternity. This, with my earnest prayers while in the body, that the Lord would help you to mind his glory, and your own soul's eternal welfare, is all the legacy you can expect from him who is both your affectionate son and Christ's prisoner.

'P. S. I hope, ere I get home, to get another sight of you. Let none see this till I be in my grave. The Lord gave me to you freely, so I intreat you be frank in giving me to him again; and the more free this be, the less cause you shall have to repent.'

His last words on the scaffold were these, 'I am come here this day, and would not change my lot with the greatest in the world. I lay down my life willingly and cheerfully for Christ and his cause, and I heartily forgive all mine enemies. I forgive all them who gave me my sentence, and them who were the chief cause of my taking; and I forgive him who is behind me (the executioner) I advise you who are the Lord's people to be sincere in the way of godliness, and you who know little or nothing of the power thereof, to come to him, and trust God, he will not disappoint you; I say, trust in the Lord, and he will support and strengthen whatever trouble or affliction you may meet with. I remember when Abraham was about to sacrifice his son, Isaac said, "Here is the wood and the fire, but where is the sacrifice?" Now, blessed be the Lord, here is the sacrifice and free-will offering. Adieu, farewel all friends.'

On the same 5th of March Henry Hall of Haughhead deceased, Mr John Menzies of Winterclench or hangingshaw,——of Calderhead,——younger of Windy-edge, Henry Boswell portioner of Dunsystoun, Robert Steil portioner of Stein, and John Mack portioner of Hinselwood, were indicted before the justiciary in absence, and found guilty and forfeited, and were all, except Henry Hall, ordered to be executed when apprehended. Perhaps it was peculiar to this period to try persons who had been dead for several years.

On the 13th the case of several gentlemen in Renfrewshire, who had been fined most unjustly by the sheriff depute for church-irregularities, came to be considered. This was the case of James Pollock of Balgray, James Hamilton of Langtoun, Matthew Stewart portioner of Newton and John Pollock of Fawside. The council reduced the fines of the two first, and acknowleged the injustice done to the two last. I must refer the reader for the particulars to my author.

On the 19th five excellent and serious Christians were executed at the cross of Glasgow, viz. John Richmond in the parish of Galston, James Winning taylor in Glasgow, Archibald Stuart in Lesmahago, James Johnstoun in the parish of Calder, and John Main in that of Old Monkland. John Richmond was apprehended last year. James Winning being informed against last February, was called out of his bed to appear before one of the magistrates of Glasgow, and not giving satisfying answers concerning Bothwell and the bishop's death, was committed to prison and prosecuted with the rest.

These five persons were tried at Glasgow, on the 17th, before the military justiciary, as I may call them. Their judges were lieutenant colonel Windram, Sir W. Fleming, Sir T. Turner, lieutenant-colonel Buchan, J. Sommervell of Spittle, sheriff depute of Lanerk, W. Stirling and John Johns. The prisoners were indicted for being at Bothwell, reset and converse. Many witnesses appeared, but none swore any thing that could touch their life, even according to the laws then in force. One witness swore that he saw John Richmond in arms at Airsmoss. The preses asked him how far distant he was from the prisoner; he answered about half a mile, and yet this was sustained as good evidence! In short, though there was no proof against any of them, they were all condemned to be executed on the 19th. The main thing for which this unjust sentence was past, was because they were silent as to the king's authority, king Charles I's. death, and that of the archbishop. They all died with the utmost chearfulness and comfort, adhering to the covenants and work of reformation, and testifying against all encroachments made upon the crown and dignity of the Lord Jesus.

The last testimonies of John Main and John Richmond are in the Cloud of Witnesses. The former says, that none of these articles of his indictment could be made criminal, such as his escaping out of prison, his being at Bothwell only as a spectator, his conversing with Gavin Wotherspoon, his refusing to call Bothwell rebellion, his owning the covenants, his not answering the questions about the king's authority, his not asserting that the death of the late king, or of the archbishop, was murder; and therefore he concludes, that he and his fellow-sufferers were murdered, only for the satisfaction of men who were worse than heathens.

Among the moving expressions Archibald Stewart had at his execution, he said, 'I die not by constraint; I am more willing to die, for my lovely Lord Jesus Christ and his truths, than ever I was to live; and my soul bleseth the Lord that ever he did accept of a testimony from the like of me. Scar not at the way of Christ because of sufferings. If you knew what of his love I have got since I was honoured with imprisonment for him, and what sweet ingredients, he hath put into my cup, ye would not be afraid of suffering. He hath paved the cross all over with love, &c.' The letter that Archibald Stewart wrote to an acquaintance shews the disposition of his mind, in which he says, 'Now, my loving friends, I am going to my father's house, to reap the fruits of all these waiting nights that you and I had together, when none knew of it but ourselves and our heavenly Father; and I die in the hope of it we shall come to your Father, and my Father, to your God and my God, to your Redeemer and my Redeemer.—Now all is sure and well with me; I am brought near unto God through the blood of his Son Jesus Christ; and I have no more to do but to lay down this life of mine that he hath given me, and take up house and habitation with my lovely Lord and Master Jesus Christ, &c. He concludes with many excellent advices which I have not room to insert. He was but a youth of 19 years of age. James Winning and James Johnstoun spoke much to the same purpose. The pious reader will form a judgment, from these short hints of the spirit and temper of these suffering martyrs, who all died with a most forgiving spirit, praying for forgiveness to their persecutors, though at the same time, assuring them that if they did not repent, their blood would be required at their hand. At the execution of these men Gavin Black of Monkland was seized by the soldiers and imprisoned, because he discovered some tokens of grief; and not satisfying their inquiries, was with others banished to Carolina: and at their burial, a relation of theirs, James Nisbet, was apprehended, and afterwards executed, as we shall relate in its proper place.

On the 24th of March the trial of Sir Hugh Campbell of Cessnock came on before the justiciary at Edinburgh his indictment was read, setting forth, 'That Sir Hugh having in June 1679, met with Daniel Crawford in Galstoun, Thomas Ingram in Borelands, John Ferguson in Catharingall, and several other of the rebels, at or near the bridge end of Galstoun, asked them where they had been; and, when they told him they had been with the Westland army, he said, that he had seen more going to them than coming from them; and having asked them if they were to return, they told him they knew not, whereupon he treasonably said, that he liked not runaways, and they should get help if they would bide by it; and bade them take courage, or some such like words to that purpose; where through the said Sir Hugh Campbell is guilty of intercommuning with notour rebels, and of giving a council and advice to go back and return to the rebellious army, and thereby was guilty of the said rebellion; which being found by an assize, he ought to be punished, &c.' As this was the only part of the indictment, the advocate insisted upon, there is no occasion to insert the rest. He was not tried on the plot.

The debates upon the relevancy of this indictment, to infer the pains of treason, took up till the 26th. Cessnock's advocates offered to prove, that on the day these persons past the bridge of Galstoun, he was at his own house at Cessnock; that the indictment bears that the defendant defendant only met with him by the way, and that the ſimple meeting of perſons on the high way, which was only accidental, and the aſking from whence they came, and whither they were going, cannot infer intercommuning. They farther inſiſted, that the words alledged to be ſpoken do not import council and advice to go back to the rebels, and that words and expreſſions can never infer a crime, far leſs the crime of treaſon, unleſs they clearly, directly and poſitively inferred the crime; eſpecially certain ſentences and ſpeeches which have been gathered five years after the ſame were pretended to have been ſpoken in a tranſient way. In ſhort, though the expreſſions ſhould be conſtructed as treaſonable, yet, as they are prior to the king's act of indemnity, the defendant cannot now be called in queſtion for them. Theſe and many other things were pleaded in behalf of the priſoner; and yet, on the 26th, the lords by a plurality of voices, found the indictment relevant.

On the 27th the jury was called and ſworn, and the advocate produced Thomas Ingram and David Crawford as evidences for the crown. Several things were objected againſt theſe witneſſes, which occaſioned a long debate. Among others, that they bore malice to the priſoner, and ſo could not be admitted, particularly Ingram, againſt whom they undertook to prove, that he ſaid ſeveral times, that if there was a way out of hell how to be avenged of this priſoner, for delating him as a murderer, he would be revenged; that he was forced to be an evidence in this cauſe, he had received money, particularly from Hugh Wallace factor to the deceaſſed lord Craigie. And witneſſes were produced, who depoſed, That Thomas Ingram had ſworn in their hearing and preſence, a great oath, that he would be avenged on Ceſnock if there was a way out of hell to do it. Ingram's father and mother ſwore, that they ſaw the above mentioned Wallace give him ſeveral pieces of money, though they could not tell how much; nay, Ingram himſelf acknowleged that he gave Wallace half-a crown at one time, and ten ſhillings at another, though he knew not upon what deſign. But notwithſtanding all this, the lords ordered the witneſſes to be received.

When Ingram was brought in, and holding up his hand to ſwear, Sir Hugh directed himſelf to him, and ſaid, 'Take heed now what you are about to do, and damn not your own ſoul by perjury; for, as I ſhall anſwer to God, and upon the peril of my own ſoul, I am here ready to declare I never ſaw you in the face before this proceſs, nor ſpake to you.' Then he was ſolemnly ſworn, and depoſed, that, being in the houſe of—Crawford, Ceſnock came to the door, and, having called upon the ſaid Crawford, he aſked what men thoſe were who was in his houſe? Crawford anſwered, they were men lately come from the Weſtland army. Then Ceſnock aſked who commanded there? Crawford anſwered, one Robert Hamilton. As Ingram was going on, one of Ceſnock's lawyers aſked him whether he had communicated this to any other, and told him that his ſoul was at ſtake, as he was under a deep oath. Ingram anſwered, I believe I have ſpoke of it to ſeverals. The juſtice-general aſked, if Ceſnock ſpoke any other words to Crawford. Ingram anſwered, My lord, I am now upon my great oath, and I declare, I do not remember he ſpoke any more at all. Upon this there was a great ſhout and clapping of hands in court, which ſo irritated the advocate, that he ſaid, that he believed Ceſnock had hired his friends to make this acclamation, in order to confound the king's evidence; and that he never heard of ſuch a proteſtant roar except in the trial of Shaftſbury; that he had always a kindneſs for that perſuaſion till now; that he was convinced in his conſcience it hugs the moſt damnable trinkets in nature.

After ſilence the juſtice-general interrogated Ingram again, who declared he had ſaid as much as he could ſay upon oath; and offering a third time to queſtion him, Alex. Niſbet of Craigentinny, one of the jury interpoſed, declaring that he only would take notice of Ingram's firſt depoſition, though he ſhould be examined twenty times. The juſtice-general anſwered him with warmth, Sir, you are not judges in this caſe. The laird of Drum, another of the jury preſently replied, Yes, my lord, we are the only competent judges as to the probation, though not of its relevancy. Whereupon the whole jury roſe, and adhered to what they had ſaid. Silence being commanded, Crawford, the other witneſs, was called, and ſwore that he did not ſee Ceſnock for a conſiderable time either before or after Bothwell-bridge; and that he does not remember that he ſpoke any thing to him, either about the Weſtland army, or who commanded them. Upon this there was another ſhout and clapping of hands, which put the juſtice general and the advocates to a terrible rage. The jury brought in their verdict Not guilty. Nevertheleſs Ceſnock was remanded to priſon, and, after ſome months, was ſent along with Mr John Rae to the Baſs. He was afterwards forfeited, and his eſtate given to Melford. Ingram and Crawford were a long time detained priſoners, and were ordered to be examined by the committee for public affairs. Several who were concerned in the noiſe during Ceſnock's trial, were obliged to beg pardon.

We have related how the advocate was ordered to proſecute the earl of Loudon, &c. Accordingly the earl on the firſt, and the lord Melvil on the eighth of April petitioned the council for the competent time to appear before the juſticiary. The lords poſtponed the proceſs againſt them till November when they were called, and declared rebels and fugitives, on account of their not appearing. They were charged with contriving the death of the king and the duke, in order to ſubvert the government; but there was no proof of theſe things. The proceſs againſt Sir John Cochran of Ochiltree was delayed till July; but the iſſue of it I know not.

On the 8th of April Mr William Erſkine, having been a cloſe priſoner for ſeven years in Blackneis caſtle, and other places, was by the council's order allowed to walk round the caſtle and take the air in the company of a keeper. He had been ordered to be ſet at liberty 1679, but why he was not is more than I can tell.

On the 9th John Cochran of Waterſide, ſon to Sir John Cochran of Ochiltree, was in abſence tried before the juſticiary; and, becauſe two witneſſes ſwore that they thought they ſaw him with the rebels, the jury brought him in guilty, and the lords condemned him to be executed when apprehended.

Next day James Howiſon, maltman in Lanerk, was indicted for being at Bothwell. The witneſſes declared that he was in company with ſome of the Weſtland army, but without arms. He could not avoid this, for he lived on the place; he was brought in guilty, and ſentenced to be hanged at the Graſs market on the 12th of November next. Whether the ſentence was executed I cannot tell.

On the 11th the council, conſidering that the priſons were full, wrote to the king for authority to ſend ſuch of the priſoners to the plantations who appeared penitent, though they took not the teſt. This was complied with.

The ſame day they agreed to a propoſal of the biſhop of Edinburgh for two faſts to be obſerved, the one in the ſpring, and the other in the harveſt. Had never worſe things come through the prelates hands than this, there had not been ſo much cauſe of complaint.

We have had ſome inſtances of the council's infringing on the freedom of electing magiſtrates in burghs; accordingly, on this 11th of April, they, finding that ſome of the magiſtrates of Ayr had encouraged the preſbyterian party, and other irregularities, and that there had been differences between provoſt Briſbane and Rob. Hunter and others, in order to ſtop all heats in that town, did declare, that at Michaelmas next, they would make choice of magiſtrates and counſellors for the enſuing year, and diſcharged the preſent magiſtrates from making any election at that time.

On the 16th John Paton of Meadow head, in the pariſh of Finwick, commonly called Captain Paton, was indicted for being with the rebels at Pentland and Bothwell. He confeſſed the fact; and being aſked if he owned authority, anſwered that he owned all authority allowed by the word of God. He was condemned to be hanged in the Graſs market on Wedneſday the 23d of April; but, being prevailed with to petition the council, he was reſpited reſpited to the 30th, and from that to Friday the 9th of May, when he ſuffered according to his ſentence. Several were inclined to favour him; but he remarks in his laſt ſpeech, which is in the Cloud of Witneſſes, that the prelates put an effectual ſtop to that. He ſays, 'I deſire to mourn for my giving ear to the counſel of fleſh and blood,——though it lays my blood the cloſſer to their door, and I think the blood of my wife and bairns. I think their ſupreme magiſtrate is not ignorant of many of their actings; but theſe prelates will not be free when our God makes an inquiſition for blood.' He lamented the differences among God's people, and forgave all his enemies, in theſe words, Now as to my perſecutors, I forgive all of them; inſtigators, reproachers, ſoldiers, privy council, juſticiaries, apprehenders, in what they have done to me; but what they have done in deſpite againſt the image of God's name in me, who am a poor thing without that, it is not mine to forgive them; but I wiſh, they may ſeek forgiveneſs of him who hath it to give, and would do no more wickedneſs.' Then he left his wife and ſix ſmall children on God, and took his farewel of all created enjoyments.

On the 17th the council took under their conſideration the caſe of ſome of the gentlemen ordered to be proſecuted in Auguſt laſt, againſt whom they could find no ſufficient evidence; and accordingly Rowallan elder and younger were releaſed upon a bond of 2000 l. ſterling to appear when called. Ceſnock elder and younger, Burnsfield and Crawfordland, had the benefit of free priſon; but Mr Carſtairs, Mr Spence of Jerviſwood, met with peculiar hardſhips, as ſhall be related in its proper place.

Thus the 22d, Mr William Spence, who had been ſecreteary to the earl of Argyll, was allowed to be taken out of the irons, but kept cloſs priſoner. It would ſeem he had been in irons ſince he was ſent down from England; and no doubt he fared the worſe for the ſake of his maſter.

The ſame day the miniſters of the then eſtabliſhment were empowered by proclamation to chuſe whom they pleaſed to ſerve as elders, and aſſiſt them in diſcipline, and to give in a liſt of them to their ordinary for his approbation; and whoever ſhall refuſe to ſerve were to be put to the horn. How far this was agreeable to Scripture directory, that none ſhould ſerve by conſtraint, but willingly, was not thought of. It was ſufficient that it flowed from the ſupremacy of a gracious king, 'whoſe predeceſſors and he had always been careful that the diſcipline of the church be obſerved.'

On the 5th of May Mr William Wiſhart ſtudent in divinity, afterwards principal of the college of Edinburgh, preſented a petition to the council, bearing, 'That, having left his ſtudies at Utrecht, to come home and viſit his aged and dying parents, upon ſome miſtake he was put in priſon, as being one of thoſe who deny his majeſty's authority; whereas he diſowns theſe principles, and, as nothing is laid to his charge, craving that he may be liberate.' The council ordered him to be releaſed, when once the advocate was ſatisfied as to his principles, upon bail to appear when called; but the advocate for ſome time, neglected to make report, and therefore he continued a conſiderable time in the iron houſe in no ſmall trouble.

The ſame day the council ordered the fugitive rolls to be printed, in order to prevent any from harbouring thoſe who were declared fugitives for being in the rebellion, or for reſet and converſe; but very few of them could be charged with the firſt. My author has printed the liſts of theſe fugitives in his appendix, No. 94. It contains no leſs than 1863, among whom are theſe following preachers, viz. Meſſ William Gilchriſt, James Welſh, John Hepburn, James Guthrie, John Forreſter,—Lennox, Tho. Wilkie, Thomas Vernor, George Barclay, John Rae, Thomas Douglas, ——— Forreſter——— Lamb, David Hume, and John Rae, and a conſiderable number of women. It is eaſy to obſerve what a ſtate the country was in when ſo many were by name marked out for deſtruction.

The ſame day on pretence that the earl of Argyll was concerting meaſures for raiſing an inſurrection, a proclamation was publiſhed, ordering the heads of the clans to have their quotas of men in readineſs to attend the new lieutenants which were ſet over Argyll-ſhire and Tarbet, whenever they ſhould call for their aſſiſtance. This was the project of the duke of York, in order to weaken the intereſt of the family of Argyll, which was ſtill great in theſe ſhires, and to encourage thoſe clans, who were generally popiſh, and ſo the more fit for accompliſhing the deep intentions of his royal highneſs.

George Jackſon having been kept in irons all laſt winter, was brought to Edinburgh on the 13th of May. Being called before a committee of the council he happened to come with his Bible in his hand; upon which the advocate ſcoffingly ſaid, There's him and his Bible. Come away, let us ſee where the text is. George replied, I was never a ſeeker out of texts, that is the work of a miniſter. Then ſaid the advocate, Put up your Bible, for we are not for preaching now. He anſwered, I am not come to preach; but, Sir, that is the word of God—and I charge you, and not only you, but all of you, that, as you ſhall anſwer one day before our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, when he ſhall judge between the juſt and the unjuſt, that you judge me by what is written in this Holy Bible, otherways, remember ye and the reſt of you ſhall account for it in that day, when our Lord ſhall ſit as judge, and ye ſtand naked and bare before him; and if ye do it not I ſhall be a witneſs againſt you. They told him he was come to be judged, and not to judge. After ſome ſilence he was examined upon the ordinary queſtions, for they had nothing elſe to lay to his charge but what they got from his own anſwers. He was returned to priſon, and kept in irons till December, when he was executed.

Mean while, the council, on the 17th, having conſidered the report of their committee concerning the priſoners referred to them, the ſaid George Jackſon and George Hutchiſon of Harlaw were remitted to the juſticiary, and they delayed the caſe of Mr William Wiſhart and others, to farther conſideration; and ordered eight or ten poor country people to be releaſed, upon promiſing to keep their pariſh church. The ſame day they ordered for tranſportation to America, William Laing in Hawick, James White in Douglaſs, John Harper in Fenwick, Gavin Muirhead in Camnethan, John Gairdner in Monkland, David Jamiſon a ſweet-ſinger, and James Balfour in Fife. Their pretended crimes were rebellion and harbouring of rebels. After the managers had agreed with Walter Gibſon merchant in Glaſgow, for the tranſportation of theſe and other priſoners, there was a ſtrange act of grace made on the 27th, by which ſuch of the rebels as were penitent were ordered to be tranſported. 'The tender mercies of the wicked are cruel!'

While theſe ſeverities were uſed to the priſoners, the country was oppreſſed by the ſoldiers. As two of them were levying the ceſs in the pariſh of Damellington, and were endeavouring to apprehend two of the wanderers, they were ſlightly wounded. Whereupon Dundas with his men came upon that village, and particularly ſeized on the goods of one Andrew Mitchel, who was noways concerned in the ſcuffle. The lieutenant called before him a great many, who he pretended, had converſed with the outlawed wanderers; 15 of whom were ſent priſoners to Edinburgh, becauſe they refuſed to ſwear they had not converſed with theſe people, and after 17 days confinement, were fined in 15,000 merks, beſides 500 to the wounded ſoldiers. James Gibſon of Enis was forced to pay the whole ſum.

On the 5th of June James Niſbet was executed at the Howgate head near Glaſgow. He, having been intimate with John Richmond and ſome of his fellow-ſufferers came to Glaſgow to pay his laſt reſpects at their burial, and, being known, was apprehended by his own couſin lieutenant Niſbet, [a perſecuting ſpirit diſſolves all the bonds of natural affection] and carried directly to the guard, where he was ſoon enſnared by their perſecuting catechiſm, if I may uſe the expreſſion. It would ſeem he was tried by the military commiſſioners for juſticiary there. He was ſo cloſely watched, that he could ſcarcely get any thing wrote.

His laſt teſtimony is in the Cloud of Witneſſes, and begins with theſe words, 'Now I am brought hither this day to lay down my life for the teſtimony of Jeſus Chriſt Chriſt, and for aſſerting him to be Head and King in his own houſe, and for no manner of fact they have againſt me. ——— Although the moſt part of the men of this generation is counting it death to call him ſo, yet I, as a dying man, live and die in the faith of it, that he ſhall appear to their confuſion, and for his own glory now trampled upon and lying ſo low.'———It is eaſy to ſee in what ſpirit and with what frame he and others changed worlds, which will be an undeniable reproach on the cruel perſecutors of that time.

The managers were after this informed of a field-meeting at Blackloch, where 100 were aſſembled in arms, and had been purſued, without effect, by colonel Windram and his party, and therefore the committee, on the 12th of June, ordered general Dalziel to examine Gavin Lawrie in Redmire, James Stuart of Hartwood, and James Walker of Roſehall, for not purſuing and giving timely notice of theſe men. On the 13th the advocate was enjoined to proſecute the heritors upon whoſe lands the rebels were ſeen. Sir William Paterſon was likeways ſent to aſſiſt at theſe examinations, and to acquaint the commiſſioner at Glaſgow, that their remiſſneſs in proceeding againſt the rebels, and other diſorderly perſons there, gave offence, and to enjoin them to be more diligent, and forthwith to puniſh theſe according to law, againſt whom the proof was clear, or who confeſſed their being in the rebellion, and continued obſtinate in their rebellious principles; and to tranſport to the plantations thoſe againſt whom there was no ſufficient evidence, and who would not confeſs their being acceſſory to the rebellion, unleſs they formally renounced the covenant, and took the oath of allegiance, &c.

Sir William returned; and, on the 19th, the council finding from his report, that moſt of the heritors in the pariſhes of Shotts, Camnethan, and Monkland had been guilty in not informing againſt thoſe who were ſeen in arms, ordered them to be ſummoned to appear before them on the firſt of July next, together with the ſheriffs of Stirling, Linlithgow and Lanerk, William Stuart of Allantoun, James Stuart of Hartwood, William Cochran of Ochiltree younger, Walker of Hacketburn, and Mr Violant indulged miniſter at Camnethan, becauſe theſe rebels had paſſed by his own houſe in arms, and he did not inform any magiſtrate or officer of it.

This looked as all the country had been up, though it is well known that thoſe people were drove to the neceſſity of meeting in arms, if they met at all, in order to defend themſelves againſt their perſecutors; otherwiſe they never injured any, but met peaceably for the worſhip of God, and diſmiſſed to their lurking places to conceal themſelves the beſt way they could: but why ſo many gentlemen ſhould be brought to all this trouble, for what was not in their power to help, muſt be left with the reader.

But, to leave this for a little. I find, on the 13th of this month, James Haſty of Harlaw, in the pariſh of Carſtairs was obliged to give Meldrum a bond of 200 merks for the great crime of non-conformity. Many were the loſſes this perſon ſuſtained, by the quartering of ſoldiers, fines, impriſonments, &c. which I have not room here to mention.

On the 19th Sir William Paterſon reported, that 22 were ordered for tranſportation from Glaſgow, and to be ſent along with Gibſon; and the ſame day the council paſſed ſentence of tranſportation againſt James MacGachin in Dalry, John Crichton in Kirkpatrick, John Mathiſon in Cloſburn, and John MacChiſholm in Spittle; and, in Auguſt, 15 more were ordered the ſame way. All this was for reſet and converſe. One John Dick, was in this month of June, baniſhed to Carolina. At his examination he owned the lawfulneſs of defenſive arms when people are oppreſſed for adhering to their principles; and being cloſely interrogated as to praying for the king, he ſaid, 'I can, as he hath a ſoul, and hath not ſinned the 'unpardonable ſin; but to pray for him as he is king, and 'for the proſperity of his courſes, I cannot do it.'

There was a joint teſtimony againſt Popery, Prelacy, &c. and for the Covenants and Works of Reformation, ſigned by the following perſons before they were ſhipped off, viz. James MacLintock, John Buchanan, William Inglis, Gabriel Black, Adam Allan, John Galt, Thomas Marſhal, William Smith, Ro. Urie, Thomas Bryce, John Syme, Hugh Syme, W. Syme, Jo. Alexander, Jo. Marſhal, Matthew Machan, John Paton, John Gibſon, John Young, Arthur Cunningham, George Smith and John Duart.

About 32 of theſe tranſports were put aboard Gibſon's ſhip about the beginning of July, and ſuffered great hardſhips, during their paſſage, through the cruelty of the captain and ſailors. What money was given them by their friends was taken from them. They were diſturbed when at worſhip under deck; and, whenever they began to ſing pſalms, they were threatened, and the hatches cloſed upon them. They had their bread by weight, and their water by meaſure; and no difference was made between the ſick and the healthy.

When they landed at Carolina they were put into houſes under a guard. What things their friends gave them to be ſold to the beſt advantage, to be diſtributed among them, where otherwiſe diſpoſed of. John Dick formerly mentioned, though he paid all his freights, except 30 ſhillings, for which he offered ſecurity, was, contrary to agreement, forced up the country as the captain's ſervant, where he died. John Smith and John Paton, being diſcovered attempting to eſcape, were beat eight times every day, and condemned to perpetual ſlavery

When they were lying ready to ſail from Clyde, Eliſabeth Linning came to viſit ſome of them who were her acquaintance, and was, by the captain's order, carried along with them, though nothing could be laid to her charge. When they got to Carolina, perceiving the captain intended to ſell her for a ſlave, ſhe took a proper opportunity, and eſcaped, and made her caſe known to the governor, who treated her civilly, and ordered the captain to be ſummoned before him the next court-day, when the captain's villany was diſcovered, and the innocent girl releaſed, and declared a free woman. Scarce ſix of thoſe priſoners ever returned to Scotland, the moſt of them dying in Carolina. But to return to the tranſactions at home.

On the firſt of July the council fined Hacketburn, Allantoun and Hartwood, according to the proclamation, and next day ordered the two laſt to be releaſed, upon engaging to ſatisfy the caſh keeper as to their fines. What Woodburn's fine was I know not, but Stuart of Hartwood was fined in 1500. Nothing could be laid to their charge, but becauſe ſome came to the above meeting in arms, through the pariſh where they lived, in their way home. Allantoun was looking out at the window by accident, and ſaw them; and Hartwood ſaw them as he was coming from church to Camnethan. It was not ſo much as pretended that they converſed with any of them, or gave them any ſupply; but, becauſe they did not raiſe the country to ſeize them on the Lord's day, this was the way they were ſerved.

On the 5th of July the earl of Perth was made chancellor in the room of lord Aberdeen, and Linlithgow made juſtice general; and the better to ſuppreſs nonconformity, a new commiſſion came down from the king to the council. None of the former members was left out, only ſome new ones were put in. His majeſty expreſſed his hopes that they would go on firmly and faithfully in his ſervice, by doing juſtice to his people, by putting the laws vigorouſly in execution againſt the fanatics, thoſe enemies not only of his perſon and government, but likewiſe of all religion and ſociety. There is no occaſion to make any remarks upon this, nor to inſert the council's fulſom letter. It is eaſy to gueſs at the ſtrain of it.

The council in order to proſecute the king's deſigns, appointed the ſame day a new committee for public affairs, conſiſting of the archbiſhops of St. Andrews and Glaſgow, the earls of Linlithgow, Balcarras and Tweeddale, the lords Drumlanerk and Livingſtone, the lairds of Drumelzier and Claverhouſe, or any three of them. This new appointed council went on in perſecuting heritors, and others, for not raiſing the hue and cry, and in thirthirſting after the blood of thoſe who could not proſtitute their conſcience to a compliance with their wicked impoſitions.

On the 16th this new committee wrote to Sir William Murray of Stanhope, and others, on account of ſome conventicles they were informed of, complaining that the gentlemen had not given notice of them according to the proclamation, which they now ordered to be reprinted; and therefore enjoined them to ſearch for and apprehend the preachers and hearers. And next day the council impowered the ſheriff-depute of Ayr, and captain Inglis, to call before them, and examine upon oath, thoſe who could give him the beſt information of the heritors through whoſe lands they who came to or went from theſe conventicles were ſeen, and ſend an account to the council. The perſons thus the butt of their malice were the followers of Mr Renwick, of whom we have heard.

On the ſame 17th of July the council had before them the laird of Dundaſs, becauſe the people as they came from the meeting at Blackloch, had gone through the bounds of his eſtate, and he had not raiſed the Hue and Cry. Dundaſs urged he was not at home for ſeveral days after that, and knew nothing of the matter for ſome time. But this defence was over-ruled, though, the ſame very day, the earl of Tweddale was accuſed of the ſame crime, and made the ſame defence, which they ſuſtained as good; for, ſays my author, it was now, Shew me the man, and I will ſhew you the law.

The ſame day Mr Violant, indulgent miniſter at Cambethan, becauſe he did not raiſe the Hue and Cry, on the Lord's day, when the people paſſed his houſe from the ſaid meeting at Blackloch, had his indulgence taken from him, and was ordered to find bail to depart the kingdom, or, in caſe he did not chuſe that, to give ſecurity not to exerciſe any part of his miniſtry under the penalty of 5000 merks. Some days after this, when he appeared before them, he told them, that he did not think a miniſter was obliged to be an informer, and owned that he had preached without his pariſh-Church, and baptized children belonging to other pariſhes, and was obliged to anſwer to his maſter Chriſt, from whom he had his inſtructions. He was ordered to priſon till he ſhould find bail, as above related.

On the 22d, according to my author, one Patrick Walker, a boy about 18 years of age, was before the council, and confeſſed that he was preſent at the murder of Francis Garden, one of the earl of Airly's troop, and refuſed to diſcover his accomplices, and was ordered to be examined by torture next day, when he was appointed to be baniſhed. But Patrick Walker's own account which he has publiſhed at the end of ſome remarkable paſſages of Meſſ. Semple, Welwood and Cameron obſerves, that it was ſeldom the clerks wrote as the priſoners ſpoke. And as Mr Wodrow takes his authority from the council's records, I ſhall therefore give the ſubſtance of Mr Walker's own relation.

He was taken out of his bed, with other four, on the 29th of June, and brought out of Linlithgow thieves-hole on the firſt of July, next day examined before the council; and that night, he, James Edward and John Gardner received their indictment for owning the covenants, defenſive arms, &c. On the third they received ſentence of tranſportation, which was pronounced by the archbiſhop of St. Andrews preſident, who, ſays he, within a month after got his ſentence elſewhere. He was again examined on the 22d; and on the 23d there was a ſtrong debate among the counſellors, whether they ſhould proſecute him for his life, or examine him by torture; but none of them took place; for ſome urged, that ſince nothing new was either confeſſed or proved, and as he was under ſentence, they could proceed no farther. However, they renewed their foreſaid ſentence. He lay in irons from that to the firſt of Auguſt, when he was put aboard a veſſel; but with 13 other priſoners he was brought back on the 6th with a deſign on his life; which was prevented. However, he continued in priſon till the 18th of May 1685, when with many others he was ſent to Dunnoter, and brought back to Leith on the 18th of Auguſt, and made his eſcape out of priſon. He ſays, that, during the 14 months he was among their hands, he was 18 times examined, and only thrice about the man's death, which happened as follows:

On March 1681, Francis Gordon (for ſo he calls him) happened to purſue and overtake James Wilſon, Thomas Young and Patrick Walker, about four miles from Lanerk. Thomas Young aſked him why he purſued them. Gordon replied, he was come to ſend them to hell. James Wilſon told him they would defend themſelves. Upon which Gordon run his ſword through Wilſon's coat, who immediately fired upon him, but miſſed him; then another of them ſhot him with a pocket piſtol. By this time William Caigow and Robert Muir, two of the wanderers, came up with them. They ſearched him for papers, and found a ſcroll of names, which were deſigned either to be killed or taken. P. Walker tore it in pieces. Every thing elſe about him they put into his pockets and left him; ſo that what they acted was in their own defence, and none of them was ever queſtioned for this, but Patrick Walker. Thomas Young afterwards ſuffered at Manchlin, but was never challenged for this. Robert Muir was baniſhed. James Walker ſurvived the perſecution. William Caigow died in the Canongate priſon, in the beginning of 1685, ſo that, ſays P. Walker, Mr Wodrow was miſinformed in ſaying that he ſuffered unto death.

On the ſaid 22d of July the council emitted another proclamation for apprehending the rebels, ſignifying, that whoever did not exert themſelves to the utmoſt, in apprehending them, other effectual courſes would be taken for preventing rebellions, and ſecuring the public peace. Though one might think that many methods had already been uſed to prevent the poor wanderers from meeting for the exerciſe of divine worſhip, yet we ſhall find that other inventions of cruelty were ſtill deſigned, and very ſoon put in execution.

Accordingly the very next day, the following act of council was made: 'Whereas the boots were the ordinary way to expiſcate matters relating to the government, and that there is now a new invention and engine called The Thumbkins, which will be very effectual to the purpoſe and intent foretaid, the lords of his majeſty's privy council do therefore ordain, that when any perſon ſhall by their order, be put to the torture, the ſaid boots and thumbkins both be applied to them, as it ſhall be found fit and convenient.' Thus they fell ſoon upon another method; but before the end of the year we ſhall find ſomething ſtill more dreadful.

The ſame day they fined John Briſbane of Freeland in the ſum of 500 l. ſterling for conventicles and non-conformity, and ordered him to ly in priſon till he paid the two thirds of it, and out of their great goodneſs ſuperſeded the other third till they ſhould ſee his future conduct.

On the 24th the act about thumbkins was firſt executed on Arthur Tacket a taylor in Hamilton, who had been apprehended as he came from hearing Mr Renwick, in order to force him to tell who preached. The advocate told him, that if he would be ingenuous and free in anſwering the queſtions, nothing he ſaid ſhould militate againſt him or any other. He anſwered, That he could not believe them, ſince they had broken their oaths, ſubſcriptions and promiſes to God and man, and that he could not think they would preſs him ſo much to declare who preached, if they did not intend to make uſe of what he ſaid, the boots were deſigned for him, but a ſurgeon telling them, that his leg being ſmall, they would cruſh it to pieces, he was therefore tortured by the thumbkins. As he had been ordered for execution the 21ſt of March 1681, ſo the lords of juſticiary condemned him to be hanged at the Graſs-market on the 31ſt of this July, which was done accordingly. In the Cloud of Witneſſes he is ſaid to have ſuffered on the firſt of Auguſt. He died with great cheerfulneſs, forgiving his perſecutors and adhering to the covenants and work of reformation, and owning all magiſtrates ſuperior and inferior, as they are agreeable to the word of God and the covenants, and as they are a terror to evil doers, and a praiſe to them that do well. My author juſtly queſtions whether ever ſuch numbers were executed for ſuch a riſing as Bothwell, eſpecially ſo many years afterwards.

On

On the ſaid 24th of July Mr William Spence was, according to an act of council, put to the torture of the boots, which he endured with a great deal of patience, diſcovering nothing which could give ſatisfaction to his inquiſitors. But, though it be allowed that torture is the laſt trial that ought to be made in the moſt extraordinary caſes, and ſo ought not to be repeated, far leſs ſucceeded by any thing more inhuman and barbarous, yet ſuch was the injuſtice and cruelty of the councellors, that, on the 26th, they made an act, ordering general Dalziel to receive Mr William Spence from the magiſtrates of Edinburgh, and to appoint a ſufficient number of officers and ſoldiers to watch him by turns, and not ſuffer him to ſleep night nor day, but uſe every method neceſſary for keeping him awake, and in the mean time, to take down in writing every thing he ſhall ſay in relation to the plot. Biſhop Burnet ſays he was kept from ſleep eight or nine nights. This was a method of cruelty, that, I believe, was never invented before. To keep a man from ſleep, night and day, was enough to deprive him of his ſenſes. But I leave the reader to make his own reflecti ons.

Some time in July, as Lewis Lawder, a ſubaltern-officer belonging to the gariſon of Sorn was with a party ſearching the country for the wanderers, they met with William Shirinlaw, a youth of about 18 years of age, at the Woodhead of Tarbolton in the ſhire of Ayr, and, after a few ordinary queſtions, Lawder commanded him to be ſhot directly. Then the party went to the ſtairhead, a place where William had been ſervant and ſeized Paul Lawmont, Matthew Bell and — Boſwel, carried them to the adjacent fields, and ordered them to kneel and cover their faces, in order to be ſhot likewiſe; but providence interpoſed, Lawder's men poſitively refuſing to obey the orders, ſaying, one in a day was ſufficient.

About this time as a guard of 28 ſoldiers were carrying nine priſoners towards Edinburgh, ſome of their wandering friends took up a reſolution to reſcue them, and for this end poſted themſelves in the narrow path of Enterkin, between Dumfries and Edinburgh. When the priſoners came up two and two tied together on horſeback, the countrymen demanded them to be releaſed, but were anſwered by a volley of ſhot, which they returned, put the guard to flight, killed one, wounded ſeveral more, releaſed ſeven of the priſoners and took them along with them. Though the laird of Lochear, a gentleman of a ſmall eſtate, who had been both at Pentland and Bothwell, was among thoſe who were releaſed, yet ſome way or another, he fell in amongſt the ſoldiers, and was greatly wounded, and cruelly uſed; but the reſcuers coming up the ſoldiers retired, and he was ſent to a country houſe in the neighbourhood, where friends took care of him as private as poſſible.

The ſoldiers carried John MacKechney, a pious good man, one of the priſoners with them to Edinburgh, where he died, after enduring 13 weeks great pain from a wound he received in his arm. When they got there, and gave an account of what happened, a ſtrick ſearch was ordered to be made through Nithdale for the reſcuers. All perſons above 15 years of age, in ten or twelve pariſhes round Enterkin, were ordered to be examined upon oath. This was intimated from the pulpits about the ſpace of ſix weeks running. Many were impriſoned, and more were oppreſſed, who knew nothing of the matter. The laird of Lochear was again apprehended, and notwithſtanding his wounds, was ſent priſoner, firſt to Dumfries, and then to Edinburgh, where he lay till his patience tired out his perſecutors; ſo that he was releaſed without any ſinful compliances.

Courts were alſo held by ſome of the forementioned commiſſioners. The laird of Lag was ſingularly diligent, and held a court in the church of Carſphairn, aſſiſted by Mr Peter Perſon the curate. The ſoldiers grew ſtill more and more inſolent. Though one George Lorimer, a youth, was ſent priſoner to Dumfries, becauſe he would not drink the king's health, yet he happily made his eſcape. But I muſt paſs theſe things.

About the end of this month and beginning of Auguſt at ſeveral meetings of the juſticiary, near 200, moſtly country people, had their proceſſes dropt.

On the firſt of Auguſt lord Neil Campbell was ordered to be confined to the town of Edinburgh, and ſix miles round it, under the penalty of 5000 l. ſterl. and to appear before the council in the ſpace of ſix hours after ſummons. Nothing worthy of death, or of bonds, could be alledged againſt him, unleſs it was a crime to be the brother of the earl of Argyll.

According to what was threatened in the proclamation, other methods of oppreſſion were appointed; for, on this day, the council, 'conſidering that ſeveral deſperate rebels do daily break out in arms, in multitudes, at their ſeditious field-conventicles, and lay ambuſcades for his majeſty's forces, and kill ſome of them,' [this refers to the reſcue at Enterkin path] ordered the forces to be ſo diſpoſed of as to be the better able to apprehend them; and accordingly more of them were cantoned through the ſhire of Ayr than in all the country beſides. They likewiſe impowered Claverhouſe, and colonel Buchan, or any deputed by them, 'to call for, and examine upon oath, all ſuch perſons as can give any information in the premiſes;' ſo that the officers in the army, or their very ſubſtitutes, were put in the place of the magiſtrates, and had power to examine the country at their pleaſure.

The ſame day they made a moſt barbarous act, ordering the priſons of Edinburgh and the Canongate to be viſited, and recommending to the juſtices to proſecute and pronounce ſentence of death on thoſe who ſhall be found to have been in the late rebellion, or were guilty of reſet of rebels, and to order the ſentence to be executed in ſix hours after paſſing of it; and the commiſſioners at Glaſgow and Dumfries to act in the ſame manner with the guilty priſoners there, only they were to execute the ſentence in three hours after it was pronounced. Thus they fell upon methods with a witneſs! I queſtion whether ſuch an act is to be met with any where but from the council of Scotland at this time, by which people were in a manner hurried into eternity.

On the fifth of Auguſt ſeveral who were unjuſtly impriſoned were releaſed. Had they ſet all at liberty who were truly ſo, the blood of many innocents would not have been in their ſkirts.

While Claverhouſe, with a party, was ſearching the pariſhes after the affairs of Enterkin, they ſurpriſed Thomas Harkneſs in Lochrbune, Andrew Clark in Leadhills in Crawford, Samuel MacEwen in Glencairn, and Thomas Wood in Kirkmichael, while aſleep in the fields, in the pariſh of Cloſburn of Daigerno. When the men were awake, and ſaw them, they endeavoured to make their eſcape; but the ſoldiers purſued, fired, and wounded them. All the houſes about the place where they were taken were plundered; and ſuch was the cruelty uſed to the priſoners; that they would not ſuffer their wounds to be dreſſed, but carried a poor woman priſoner along with them ſome part of the way for offering her aſſiſtance. When they came to a narrow paſs, Claverhouſe ordered his men to kill the priſoners, if any ſhould attempt to reſcue them, though they had nothing to lay to their charge. When they were brought before the council three of the ſoldiers falſely ſwore that theſe men were at Enterkin path, and were wounded there which they abſolutely refuſed. Thomas Wood was referred till afterwards; but the other three were referred to the juſticiary on this fifth of Auguſt, condemned and executed the ſame day. They drew up a ſhort joint teſtimony, which is in the Cloud of Witneſſes, and in inſerted in my author; in which they ſay, among other things, 'We were queſtioned for not owning the king's authority. We anſwered, That we owned all authority that is allowed by the written word of God and ſealed by Chriſt's blood.—We bleſs the Lord we are not a whit diſcouraged, but content to lay down our lives with cheerfulneſs, and boldneſs, and courage; and, if we had an hundred lives, we would willingly quit with them all for the truth of Chriſt. Good news! Chriſt is no worſe than he promiſed.—'Him that overcometh will he make a pillar in his temple.' Our time is ſhort, and we have little to ſpare, having got our ſentence at one o'clock in the afternoon, and are to die at five this day. And ſo we will ſay no more, but Farewell all friends and relations, and welcome heaven, and Chriſt Chriſt, and the croſs for Chriſt's ſake.' Samuel MacEwen wrote a ſhort letter to a friend on this occaſion, ſhewing with what gladneſs he laid down his life, and the aſſurance he had of a glorious eternity.——Theſe were the perſons marked out for deſtruction by the bloody judges of this period, who not only thirſted for blood, but made haſte to ſhed it.

James Nicol merchant in Peebles, being preſent at this execution, was conſtrained in the bitterneſs of his ſpirit, to ſay in the hearing of many, Theſe kine of Baſhan have puſhed theſe three good men to death at one puſh, contrary to their own baſe laws, in a moſt inhuman manner. Whereupon he was immediately ſeized, and carried to priſon, to fill up the next ſcene of blood.

Mean while on the ſixth of Auguſt, Kobert Goodwin maltſter in Glaſgow was ſentenced to be baniſhed, becauſe he would not own the king's ſupremacy, nor promiſe to attend on ordinances under the biſhops, &c. The reader may think he was well off, as things went. However, he was with others ſent to Dunnoter, and afterwards made his eſcape.

The fines impoſed at this time were moſt exhorbitant; for it appears, from an extract dated the 11th of Auguſt, that the fines impoſed on the heritors of the ſhire of Roxburgh, for not keeping the church, amounted to no leſs than 274,737 l. Scots, or 28,894 l. 15s. ſterling. I ſhall not pretend to give particular accounts of the prodigious fines in other places. From this one inſtance we may form a judgment of the great oppreſſion of the country from this branch of perſecution.

On the 17th they made a third act for the torture of Mr. William Spence, in order to force him to petition to be allowed to make a free and open confeſſion, which he did. Biſhop Burnet ſeems to intimate that he was tortured with the thumbkins, and that, in that extremity, he capitulated that no new queſtions ſhould be put to him but thoſe already agreed on; and that he ſhould not be obliged to be a witneſs againſt any perſon; and that he himſelf ſhould be pardoned. And, accordingly, two days after, he declared, upon oath, 'That he believed an inſurrection was intended within theſe two years: as to what is to come, he cannot tell what the people abroad may be a doing; that he often heard of deſigns and aſſociations; but, that they were directly intended to hinder the duke's ſucceſſion to the crown, he cannot ſay; for all that he underſtood was pretended for the ground of any deſigns of arms, was the defence of the proteſtant religion, and the liberties of the kingdom; and, if againſt the duke's ſucceſſion, it was only in ſo far as that might be prejudicial to theſe; and that he thinks upon the king's death, troubles may ariſe.' The council, two days after this, declared that what he had ſaid ſhould not be prejudicial to any. Mr Spence was likeways prevailed on to decypher the earl of Argyll's letter, in which Mr Carſtair's name was expreſſed; but, ſays biſhop Burnet, none of theſe letters ſpake any thing of any agreement then made. However, this turned out to the prejudice of Mr Carſtairs.

On the 18th Mr Robert Baillie of Jerviſwood, who had been long in priſon, and being now in a declining ſtate of health, his lady was permitted to viſit him with the phyſicians; but ſhe was to ſpeak nothing to him but what they heard.

The ſame day James Nicol, according to the Cloud of Witneſſes, was examined by the council, and was bold and couragious in his anſwers. Concerning praying for the king, he ſaid, 'If he belongs to the election of grace, he has a part of my prayers; and alſo, if he were a king that had kept covenant with God, I would give him a double ſhare, and make mention of his name; but he is an apoſtate.' When they aſked him how he proved from Scripture what he ſaid againſt the Prelates, he told them, By many Scriptures. 'The kings of the Gentiles exerciſe lordſhip over them, and they that exerciſe authority upon them are called benefactors; but it ſhall not be ſo among you, but he that is greateſt among you ſhall be ſervant of all: not like your glutton, epicurean, belly-god prelates, who are riding in coaches in great pomp.' Upon this he was interrupted. He ſays, that concerning the tyrant, for I uſe his own words, he added, 'That he was brought home by Mr Livingſtone, and others; (Vol. I. p. 60.) and put in a nobler ſtate than any king in the whole world, crowned a covenanted king with the eternal God to be for him, to carry on his work and cauſe, he and all the people; which, if he had continued in, he would have been the greateſt king in all the lands and nations in the world, and would have been a terror to all the kings in Europe; but now he hath made himſelf baſe and a reproach to all the nations. And another reaſon why I dare not own him, nor you either, is, becauſe he and you have robbed Chriſt of his crown, although it be not in your power to do it.' Then he was ſent to the iron-houſe and loaded with irons. Next day he was brought again before them, and re-examined upon the ſame points, which I ſhall therefore omit. We ſhall find him in a few days before the juſticiary.

Mean while on the 18th of Auguſt, the council made an act impowering the advocate to proſecute criminally thoſe who owned the king's authority according to the covenant. By this the council did more than ever the parliament had yet ventured to do; and thus the owning of the covenants, the glory of the nation, was made treaſonable; but it was not improper, when a papiſt was near aſcending the throne, that the chief bulwarks of the reformation ſhould be removed.

We have frequently related what exorbitant fines were impoſed for non-conformity. John Forbes of Leſly in Aberdeen-ſhire, had been fined in 2320 l. Scots by the laird of Kinmundie for not keeping the church, and on this 19th of Auguſt, he gave in a petition to the council, ſetting forth that his not attending the church was only becauſe the incumbent, Mr Mowat, was placed without his approbation, he being patron, and that he attended ordinances elſewhere: and indeed Mr Forbes was no Whig; and therefore the council ſuſpended the letters. But though Alex. Nairn of Santford in Fife, and the Lady Abden, had been more exorbitantly fined, yet they had no redreſs. The counſel ſeldom met after this, but they had complaints of exorbitant fines by ſheriffs and ſuch as had council power. It would be endleſs to give particulars.

The ſame day, in conſequence of a report from a committee appointed to examine the ſtate of the priſoners in the priſons of Edinburgh and the Canongate, which were crouded, twenty of them, who were mean country people, were ordered to be releaſed, upon, obliging themſelves to keep the church and live regularly: but Robert Tam and Gabriel Thomſon in Carmonnock, William Campbell at Muirkirk, John Ure maltſter in Glaſgow, John MacLevy ſhoemaker in Kilmarnock, amd William Young taylor in Evandale, were appointed to be proſecuted before the juſticiary according to law; as likewiſe J. Nicol, formerly mentioned, for diſowning the king; and John Campbell tenant in Muirkirk, and John Campbell ſon to William Campbell of Overwellwood, to be purſued before the council in order to baniſhment.

The gentleman laſt mentioned, being ſcarce 18 years of age, and his elder brother William about 20, had an uncommon ſhare of ſufferings at this time. When they were living peaceably at the houſe of their excellent father, about the beginning of this month, they were ſeized by a party commanded by Bonſhaw, when walking in the fields on Welwood-hill, and carried to the houſe of the Welwood, where they were kept till their father's houſe was rifled, and three of his riding horſes taken away. Bonſhaw ſwore at the ſoldiers, becauſe they did not ſhoot them directly; for he was in a rage that two Bibles ſhould be found about them, which was looked upon as a certain mark of diſloyalty.

After ſome removes they were carried on the Sabbath following to the priſon of Glaſgow, and laid in irons till next day, when they were examined on the ordinary queſtions, firſt by the lord Roſs, and then by lieutenant-colonel Windram, who among other things, aſked John Campbell if he would pray for the king. He anſwered, That he both did and would, that the Lord would give him a godly life here, and a life of glory hereafter. Windram ſaid, That is not enough; you muſt pray for king Charles II. as he is ſupreme over all perſons and cauſes eccleſiaſtical as well as civil. The other ſaid, In his opinion opinion that was praying for him as head of the church, which belongeth only to Christ; and he reckoned it arrogance in any creature whatsoever to claim it.

They were kept in irons, eight days, and were then carried to Edinburgh, with their legs tyed under their horse's belly, and put in the Cannongate prison, from whence they were brought several times before the committees of the council and examined. Once John was asked if he had been at Bothwell. He answered, No; for he was only put to the Grammar-school the Martinmass after it. The clerk wrote. 'As to Bothwell, the 'prisoner answers, I was but young then; but, had I been 'old enough, I would have been there.' When this was read to him, in order to subscribe it, he told them that the clerk was unjust; and wrote a lie, and appealed to the lords present; but the matter was hushed. They used all arts to get him to comply, and, among other things, told him that his brother had complied, and satisfied the council. This was worse than the clerk's conduct; for it was a lie spoken in judgment. Mr. John stood his ground notwithstanding; but was so grieved at his brother's supposed conduct, who had been carried to the prison of Edinburgh, that he wrote an unsubscribed Letter, which he sent by one Margaret Aird, who was seized at the door of the prison, and carried along with Mr William Campbell before the council, and strictly examined concerning the writer of the letter. She was tortured by the thumbkins, and he threatened with the boots; but nothing could prevail. Next they ordered a committee to examine the prisoners in the canongate prison on this point, particularly John Campbell of Overwellwood, and his cousin of the same name, who were removed from the room they were in to the iron-house. They were not long there, for on the 21st of August, they found means with eleven others, to break prison and make their escape. One William Young was re-taken, and suffered, and another was wounded.

The two cousins met, the night after their escape, on the hill of Tintock, and from thence went to Ayr shire, where they were joined by John Campbell's father, and William Campbell of Middle-wood, and spent that winter and part of the following year in the fields, as privately as they could. It is easy to conceive the hardships they underwent, in being exposed to all manner of weathers: but this was the case of many hundreds besides, who were forced to wander about in dens and caves of the earth. William Campbell died of a consumption, contracted by the severities he met with in the prison at Edinburgh. His father and brother survived the persecution, and the latter was made a captain of horse by king William, to whom he did singular service in many parts of the kingdom. But I must return to the history.

The day after the prisoners escape the magistrates of Edinburgh were enjoined to take more care of the prisoners for the future, else they alone should be accountable for any that should afterwards escape. This day James Nicol got his indictment, and was told that he was to be condemned and executed on the 27th.

On the 25th Dr James Welwood, famous for his curious memoirs and other writings, was ordered to be sent to Coupar, to satisfy the sheriff for his non-conformity.

Next day the council had a petition presented by one Robert Aitkin, and about twenty-two men and women who were most unjustly fined by Kennoway, and ordered a stop to be put to the execution of the letters raised against them on that account. Matters must have been wrong when the council interposed.

The same day they ordered a party to bring in Patrick Lang maltster in Greenock, James Holm, William Baird, William Andrew, James Warden, William Scot, Marion Muir, —— Linning, George Muir, and other prisoners, to Edinburgh, for being at a field meeting, held by Mr James Renwick, where a child was baptized.

On the 27th James Nicol and William Young were brought before the justiciary, condemned in the forenoon, and executed in the afternoon. There was no other proof against any of them but their confession, which was extorted by the ordinary questions which they answered.

James Nicol died in much peace and comfort, protesting that he expected salvation, not by any merit, but of free grace, saying, 'I have been beginning to pray and praise these thirty six years, weakly as I could, but yet I am just to begin this night both to praise and pray; for I lay no more stress upon all that I have said and done, believed and suffered, nor on a straw, God is my witness; so that I must have salvation upon Wednesday at three or four o'clock, as free as the thief on the cross. And what can poor silly James Nicol say more?'

William Young had, for some years before he was apprehended, been out of his right mind. He was one of those who escaped out of prison, and would not have been known had he not himself told the soldiers that he had broke the tolbooth. He was most barbarously used when recommitted, but he bore all his sufferings with patience, saying, that extreme pain would be intolerable if eternal, but he was now near the crown, and rejoiced in the full assurance of it.

On the 30th Mr Baillie of Jerviswood was ordered to be prosecuted for entertaining and corresponding with rebels; and on the fourth of September, because he refused to answer upon oath the questions put to him, was fined in the sum of 6000 l. sterling. Bishop Burnet tells us, the 'ministers of state were most earnestly set on Baillie's destruction, though he was now in so languishing a state——that if his death would have satisfied the malice of the court, that seemed to be very near——An accusation was sent him, not in the form of an indictment, nor grounded on any law, but on a letter of the king's, in which he charged him, not only for a conspiracy to raise a rebellion, but for being engaged in the Rye plot; of all which he was now required to purge himself by oath, otherwise the council would find him guilty of it, and proceed accordingly. He was not, as they said, now in a criminal court, but before the council, who did only fine and imprison. It was for no purpose for him to say, that by no law, unless it was in a court of inquisition, a man could be required to swear against himself, the temptation of perjury being so strong when self preservation was in the case:——but to answer all this, it was pretended he was not now on his life, and that whatsoever he confessed was not to be made use of against his life, as if the ruin of his family, which consisted of nine children, and perpetual imprisonment, were not more terrible, especially to one so near his end as he was, than death itself; but he had to do with inexorable men; so he was required to take this oath within two days. And by that time, he not being able to appear before the council, a committee was sent to tender him the oath, and take his examination. He told them he was not able to speak by reason of the low state of his health, and in general protested his innocence, and his abhorrence of all designs against the king or the duke's life. He desired they would leave the other interrogatories with him. They persisted to require him to take his oath; but he as firmly refused it. So, upon their report, the council construed this refusal to be a confession, and fined him as above, and ordered him to ly in prison till it was paid.

A few days after this, they ordered his lady and his sister the lady Graden, to be removed from his room in the prison, because they were informed his bodily indisposition was abated, though his recovery was but slender, and he soon after relapsed; wherefore his sister was permitted to be close prisoner with them. She had been fined for nonconformity by the sheriff of Teviotdale in 2000 and odd pounds. The lady Greenhead and John Wilson of Dunikier had likewise been exorbitantly fined. But I go on to

CHAP. X.

Of the torture of the Rev. Mr Carstairs; the proceedings of the council, and circuit courts, together with the societies apologetical declarations.

THE first thing that occurs, in the order of time, is The case of the Rev. Mr William Carstairs, who immediately after the decyphering of Argyll's letter, was ordered to be put in irons, in which he continued for some weeks; during which time the earl of Melford earnestly neſtly dealt with him to confeſs what he knew as to the plot, and offered him conditions that many in his circumſtances would have thought very encouraging; particularly, that nothing he ſaid ſhould be brought in prejudice to any man, directly or indirectly, upon trial. Melford had the council's authority to offer this. However Mr Carſtairs did not think proper to comply, though lord Perth had told him, ſince he had refuſed ſo many ſingular favours beyond any priſoner, that before God he ſhould be tortured, and never a joint of him left whole.

The council, on the 5th of September, ordered that he ſhould be queſtioned in torture that afternoon, and agreed upon 20 queſtions to be propoſed to him, all relating to the perſons ſuſpected to be engaged in the foreſaid conſpiracy, which the reader may ſee at large in my author, Vol. II. P. 391. In the afternoon he was brought before them, and the declarations of major Holmes and Mr Shepherd were read. He told them he had never been confronted with them, which was an evidence that they had ſaid things they would not have had the confidence to have aſſerted in his preſence. Then he was urged to anſwer, upon oath, the queſtions to be propoſed, and was told that nothing he ſaid ſhould ever militate againſt him, neither ſhould they enquire whether his anſwers were true or falſe; but he refuſed to comply, being unwilling to begin ſo bad a precedent. They aſked him next, what reaſons he had why he ſhould not be tortured. He replied, that he humbly conceived he could not be tried there, becauſe the order by which he was ſent to Scotland was expreſs, that he ſhould be tried for crimes committed againſt the government in that kingdom, and deſired to know if the lord advocate had any thing to lay to his charge of that nature. His lordſhip declared he had not; but that, being now in Scotland, if he had been guilty of contriving againſt his majeſty's government at Conſtantinople, he might be tried for it. Mr Carſtairs told them, though that was true, yet the crimes he was accuſed of were ſaid to be committed in England, where his majeſty's laws were in force for the ſecurity of his kingdom, as well as in Scotland, which at Conſtantinople they were not: but this was over-ruled, though it was a notorious breach of the habeas corpus act. After ſome farther commoning the king's ſmith was called in with the thumbkins; and accordingly his thumbs were put in the ſcrews, which were drawn ſo hard, that, ſays biſhop Burnet, as they put him to extreme torture, ſo they could not unſcrew them, till the ſmith by whom they were made was obliged to uſe his tools to take them off. Under this torture he continued an hour and an half. Mean while the torturing by the boot was tried; but the former executioner being in priſon for ſome crime, and he that then officiated being ignorant how to uſe it, it was put off till next day, and in the interim, the lord treaſurer-depute was appointed to confer with him, in order to bring him to an ingenuous confeſſion.

On the 6th the council, being informed that Mr Carſtairs was content to ſwear upon the interrogatories, made an act impowering the lord treaſurer-depute to give his word of honour, that, upon his anſwering, upon oath, what queſtions ſhould be put to him by the firſt of October next, he ſhould have his majeſty's full pardon, never be brought as witneſs againſt any perſon or judicatory, directly or indirectly, for any thing contained in his anſwers, nor ever be queſtioned as to any thing prior to this day, after the ſaid firſt of October.

His examination came upon the 8th. His candour was ſingular in the anſwers he gave to their queſtions. The reader may ſee his depoſitions in the State-trials, and in prat's copies of informations; and that they all amounted to no more than ſome looſe diſcourſes about what was proper to be done at ſuch a criſis, for preſerving their religion and liberties: but the council recorded nothing in their regiſters of what paſſed at his examination, only they ordered his depoſitions to be printed a few hours after they were made, and that in ſo lame and ſo unfair a manner, that probably they were aſhamed to inſert them in their regiſters; and, which was worſe, contrary to the conditions given, they produced and read them at the trial of Jerviſwood, and others, to ſupport their evidence, as we ſhall relate; it was but equivocating to ſay that Mr Carſtairs was not perſonally adduced as a witneſs; for, if his declarations were produced, he reckoned he was made an evidence. This reverend perſon vindicated himſelf and his brethren in England from all aſſaſſinating deſigns, which, he ſays, they abhorred, and, in a letter to my author, expreſſes himſelf in theſe terms; 'Now, as to the whole of this unpleaſing ſubject, I do declare, that this affair is, ſo far as I was concerned in it, as to any conſultations, no farther than diſcourſe as to what might be proper to be done for ſecuring our religion and liberty from dangers they were then in, without any deſign againſt the royal perſons of the king and his brother. —I ſhould be guilty of the moſt horrid injuſtice, If I ſhould accuſe any of the worthy gentlemen of my country that were my fellow-priſoners, or any of the Engliſh diſſenting miniſters, of having the leaſt knowlege or concern in the abominable aſſaſſination of the king or his brother; for I did then, as I do now, abhor ſuch practices; nor can I, to this hour, tell really what was in that matter that makes ſuch a noiſe; for nothing in my maimed depoſitions that are printed hath any regard to any thing of that nature, except as to what Mr Ferguſon and Mr Shepherd did ſay, for which they alone are to be anſwerable; and I muſt alſo ſay, that Mr Shepherd did own his abhorrence of ſuch practices.—I cannot but alſo acquaint you, that I think it was a hardſhip put upon me to print my depoſitions as they ſtood, becauſe they were very lame; ſince ſimple anſwers to queſtions were ſet down, and neither the queſtions that gave riſe to ſuch anſwers, nor the juſt extenuations, as to perſons and things, which I gave in my anſwers; which had they been publiſhed, it would have been found, from what I ſaid, that there could be no reaſon given why that affair ſhould have been proſecuted with ſo much cruelty and violence.'

Biſhop Burnet ſays, 'That Mr Carſtairs had at this time ſome ſecrets of great conſequence truſted to him by Fagel, of which they [the managers in Scotland] had no ſuſpicion; and ſo they aſked him no queſtions about them. Fagel told the doctor, that he ſaw by that how faithful Carſtairs was, ſince he could have ſaved himſelf from torture, and merited highly if he had diſcovered them. And this was the foundation of his favour with the prince of Orange, and of the great confidence he put in him to his death.' I ſhall have occaſion to mention this great man again at the trial of Mr Baillie of Jerviſwood; and now I proceed to other things, as they occur in the order of time.

Circuit-courts having been again reſolved upon at London upon application from the biſhops and managers in Scotland, the king's letter, ordering the council to give a commiſſion for them, was read on the 6th of September. Accordingly commiſſioners were appointed for the ſeveral ſhires, and their commiſſion was to continue in force til the firſt of December, or longer, if the council ſhould think fit. They or any two of them, were to act within the bounds preſcribed as commiſſioners of juſticiary, in all matters of life and death; and by their inſtructions which conſiſted of twenty-eight articles, they were to diſarm all heritors and commons, except the militia, who have not taken the teſt, and fine the refuſants; to ſeize all preachers, chaplains not authoriſed by the biſhop, and ſend them in to the council; to examine the indulged miniſters on their inſtructions, remove ſuch as have tranſgreſſed, and impriſon them till they find ſecurity not to preach, or exerciſe any part of their miniſterial work, or elſe to remove from the three kingdoms; they were farther, by their inſtructions, impowered to turn out all the wives and children of forfeited perſons and fugitives from their habitations, if it ſhall appear that they have converſed with their parents or huſbands, or if they ſhall refuſe to vindicate themſelves by oath. In a word, they had, in a manner an unlimited power, and might do what they pleaſed; their inſtructions carried them even to fire and ſword; ſo that reflections upon this are altogether unneceſſary. But as it was October before theſe terrible circuits ſat down, it will be proper to relate ſome intervening occurences.

On the 9th Mr John Sinclair miniſter at Ormiſtoun having thought proper to retire to Holland, was indicted before the juſticiary, in abſence, for preaching treaſonable ble doctrine, preſſing the renewing of the covenants, defenſive arms, declaiming againſt the king, calling the duke a rebellious enemy to God, and the councellors rogues, and praying that God would open the king's eyes to ſee the evil of his ways, and turn him from it, (a very good prayer) or elſe take him away from being a ſcourge and a curſe to God's people. But though there was no ſhadow of proof for theſe alledged expreſſions, yet he was forfeited and declared a fugitive and outlaw.

On the 15th, in order to prevent the ſufferers from flying from the perſecution then carried on, a proclamation was publiſhed, requiring all maſters of ſhips, going from or returning to the kingdom, to preſent all their paſſengers upon oath, to the ſeveral perſons to be named by the cuſtomers in the precinct mentioned in the proclamation, under the penalty of impriſonment, confiſcation of their goods, and being rendered incapable of being maſter of a ſhip, bark, or any other veſſel for the time to come.' And,

On the 16th another proclamation was publiſhed, diſcharging all perſons to travel from one ſhire to another, without a paſs from ſome perſon in the government, under the pain of being puniſhed as diſaffected perſons: ſo that, as the former proclamation could not but be prejudicial to trade and commerce, ſo this was ſubverſive of the liberties of the ſubject. It is ſtrange the orthodox clergy were not impowered to give paſſes!

But this was the time when little regard was paid to the liberties of the ſubject; for the ſame day the council nominated a provoſt, bailies, and town council for the town of Ayr; nay, this month and the following, as my author found from the regiſters, they engroſſed the whole power of nominating the magiſtrates in moſt of the royal burghs. They even ordered a committee to be preſent and overſee the election of the magiſtrates of Edinburgh.

The deſign was now formed to turn out all the indulged miniſters, and either to make them promiſe not to preach, or engage to remove from the kingdom, as appears from the inſtructions given to the circuits. They had nothing to object againſt their loyalty; for they rather exceeded in that point, and laid themſelves too much open to the cenſures of many of their ſuffering brethren: but this brings to my mind what the noble proto martyr ſaid to ſome miniſters who were admitted to attend him, (Vol. I. p. 119.) 'Though you go along with theſe men in part, if you do not in all things, you are but where you were, and ſo muſt ſuffer; and if you go not at all with them, you ſhall but ſuffer.' Accordingly,

On the ſaid 16th of September, Mr John Knox, indulged at Weſt-calder, ſon to Mr Knox miniſter in Bowden in Tiviotdale, appeared before the council, and was impriſoned, where he continued till the king's death. It was in vain for this worthy perſon to plead his former ſervices to the king, during his exile, for this was not a time when regard was paid to former favours. He was chaplain to Sir John Brown's regiment of horſe at the battle of Inverkeithing. His elder brother Mr Henry was frequently employed by the king in negotiating his affairs in Scotland. Many of the king's letters to his friends were directed to Mr John: nay, the king wrote a letter to himſelf, dated at St. Germains, Auguſt the 3d 1652, wherein he expreſſes a great value for his intereſt and negotiations, and concludes it thus. 'I could heartily wiſh therefore, that, by your intereſt and negotiation with theſe you dare truſt, and who you know wiſh me well, ſome way may be thought of to aſſiſt me with money, which would be a very ſeaſonable obligation, and could never be forgotten by me. I need ſay no more, but that I ſhall be glad to receive any advice or advertiſement from you that ye think neceſſary for me, and ſhall always remain your very loving friend, &c.' Mr Knox was ordained miniſter of North Leith, from which he was ejected at the reſtoration of his very loving friend, becauſe he could not in conſcience ſubmit to prelacy; and, though he was afterwards indulged at Weſt-calder, yet now he was impriſoned, becauſe, when the managers inſiſted upon his giving bond never to exerciſe his miniſtry in Scotland, he told them that he looked on himſelf as a miniſter of Chriſt, and would never tie up himſelf from preaching his goſpel.

The ſame day the council ordered Hay of Park, Alexander Munro, and Campbel of Ardkinglaſs to be ſent to Blackneſs caſtle. Mr. Hay continued in priſon till Auguſt next year; and Mr Campbel, about the end of next April, was brought to Edinburgh under a ſtrong guard, in order to appear before the parliament. But nothing of moment was evidently proved againſt him. What was the iſſue is not known.

The ſame day they made an act ordering thoſe who would not declare Bothwell to be a rebellion, the primate's death to be murder, or who owned the Covenants, or only heſitated on theſe things, to be proſecuted criminally, or tried for their life. This was the patern of the queſtions propoſed by the ſoldiers to thoſe whom they afterwards met with and murdered in the fields.

During all theſe unprecedented methods of oppreſſion Mr. James Renwick continued to exerciſe his miniſtry, and preach in the fields, notwithſtanding the many hazards he and his followers run, and the inexpreſſible hardſhips they endured, which were ſtill more and more increaſing; for, on the 16th, he was ordered to be intercommuned; and, on the 19th, was indicted, in abſence, before the juſticiary, for being at Bothwell, (which was falſe, for he was then a boy at the college) for preaching at field-conventicles, in arms, &c. Next day letters of intercommuning were iſſued out againſt him, prohibiting all the ſubjects from receiving, ſupplying or furniſhing him with meat, drink, houſe, harbour, &c. or converſing with him, either by word or writing, under the higheſt pains.—

On the 25th John Brown, journeyman-taylor in Edinburgh, having been taken in Libberton's-wynd, was ordered to ly in irons till farther orders, for not owning the king's authority without his own limitations; refuſing to pray for him at their deſire, ſince that ought to be gone about in a devout manner and place for prayer; owning the lawfulneſs of riſing in arms for the Covenant, &c. It is ſurpriſing, he was not ſent directly to the juſticiary and execution; but, poſſibly, ſays my author, there was not a quorum of the juſtices in town.

Some time this month Major Balfour ſeized one Colin Alliſon, a weaver in Glaſgow, in his own houſe, and committed him to priſon, where he lay till the revolution. Non comformity was his only crime.

I am now, according to the order of time, to relate ſome of the proceedings of the circuit-courts. The deſign of judicators is to puniſh the guilty and protect the innocent; but theſe courts, without paying any regard to juſtice, equity, or the liberty of the ſubject, moſt barbarouſly haraſſed all ranks of people, under the pretence of their receiving and converſing with rebels; but, to the honour of this mild adminiſtration be it ſpoken, their oppreſſive powers were very large, and by virtue of a royal letter, dated the 27th of September, the council and their commiſſioners were impowred, when there was no legal proof, to refer the matters of accuſation to the oath of the defendant, and to puniſh him as guilty upon his refuſing to ſwear.

The circuit ſat down at Dumfries on the 2d of October. The judges were Queenſbery, his ſon, and Claverhouſe. Their diſtrict was Dumfries, Galloway and Nithſdale; in which diſtrict the judges continued about a month. All the heritors were called, and required to take the teſt, which was offered as a favour to thoſe who were charged with what they called irregularities; and the recuſants were impriſoned and fined. Moſt of them complied. Mr. Hugh Maxwel of Dalſwinion, one of thoſe who ſtood out, was exorbitantly fined, and endured a long impriſonment. When they had done with the heritors, they fell to work with the common people. All who would not ſwear they did not hear preſbyterian miniſters, or had not converſed with whom they called rebels, &c. the men were obliged to take the teſt, and give their oath, never to harbour, or ſhew any kindneſs, &c. to any of the intercommuned wanderers, and to raiſe the Hue and Cry upon their hearing of them, or diſcovering them; the women were to ſwear not to cohabit, or ſhew the leaſt kindneſs to their huſbands or children. The recuſants, men and women, were ſent to priſon, by which means the priſons were crowded.

From

From Dumfries theſe judges went to Kircudbright, and from that to Wigtoun, and acted in the ſame manner; and, in the mean time, particular gentlemen and officers of the army were commiſſioned to hold courts in thoſe pariſhes where the principal judges could not reach. At theſe ſub-courts ſeveral were obliged to ſwear over again, though they had already ſatisfied the principal judges. Many who did not take the teſt were unjuſtly fined and impriſoned. About 28 priſoners were brought to Dumfries to wait the return of the judges, and were moſt cruelly treated by the way, not being allowed the very neceſſaries of life.

While the judges were thus at work, the heritors, &c. of the ſtewarty of Kircudbright were brought to preſent an addreſs, dated the 9th of October, wherein they offered to his majeſty five months ceſs yearly, for the ſpace of four years, for maintaining the ſtanding army, and the better ſecuring the peace and quiet of the kingdom; and bound themſelves, for their tenants and cottars, for the future, to live regularly, or be removed from their lands. I ſhall relate how the heritors of the ſhire of Air were brought to comply with this; and it is not unlikely the ſame methods were uſed by theſe commiſſioned judges where ever they went.

Mr. William MacMillan of Caldow, the Rev. Mr. William MacGeorge miniſter at Heriot, Charles Maxwell, and others, had an uncommon ſhare of ſufferings at this circuit at Dumfries. Mr. MacMillan had his health greatly impaired by his former ſufferings, (Vol. I. p. 350.) He was declared rebel and fugitive after Bothwel, and all his goods confiſcated, which obliged him to conceal himſelf for ſeveral months in the fields. Theſe hardſhips threw him into a violent fever. He was no ſooner recovered, but the ſoldiers dragged him before this court at Dumfries. Becauſe he declined to anſwer their enſnaring queſtions, and refuſed the teſt, he was ordered to Wigtoun to take his trial there. As he walked a-foot he fainted and fell down, whereupon the ſoldiers put him upon a bare colt, to the great hazard of his life. He was confined to the guard-houſe at Wigtoun for eight days, without a bed to ly on, though he was afflicted with a dyſentery and flux; neither would the lords, when they came there, allow him the benefit of the common priſon or to give bond to appear at Edinburgh. He was carried from place to place; and on the 22d of November, he and upwards of 80 men, women, and ſome children, were confined all night to the church at Moffat, notwithſtanding the rigour of the ſeaſon; and next day, being the Sabbath, they were removed from thence to Edinburgh, where they were diſtributed through the ſeveral priſons of the city and Canongate, and, at laſt, many of them ſent to Dunnoter, of which I ſhall give an account next year. Theſe priſoners, in their way to Edinburgh, endured the rudeneſs of the ſoldiers, and the ſcoffing of the profane. One James Muirhead, late bailie of Dumfries, was taken ill on the road, and not being allowed the benefit of a phyſician, died in priſon at Leith.

Mr MacGeorge and James Muirhead, above mentioned, together with John Irvine, John Scot, John Gibſon, Homer Gilliſon, James Muir, Andrew MacClelland, and others, were all carried to the priſon at Leith. Mr MacGeorge was confined there till the middle of April next year, when he was releaſed upon giving bond to appear when called.

Charles Maxwell in the pariſh of Keir was before this infamous court, for doing ſome acts of kindneſs to his ſiſter in law, who had been ſeveral months in priſon for her non comformity; and, becauſe he refuſed the teſt, was put into the thieves hole, and laid in irons. By the intreaty of his friends, and not having the ſame courage with others under his ſufferings, he at laſt complied, and was releaſed upon paying the fees.

Some women narrowly eſcaped priſon by ſome of theſe circuits, becauſe they aſſiſted a woman in labour whoſe huſband was pretended to be one concerned in the Enterkin-path reſcue. This was conſtrued reſet and converſe.

Many were exorbitantly fined; particularly William Martin ſon to J. Martin of Dullarg, was fined in the ſum of 700 l. Scots. Sometime before this, when he was at Edinburgh, Queenſbury ſent for him, and offered to purchaſe the fortune he had a right to by his marriage with the heireſs of Carſe; but, becauſe Mr Martin would not part with it for what he offered, Queenſberry told him he would make him repent it, and threatened to purſue him for his life. Whereupon Mr Martin ſold his right much under the value. In the beginning of this year his wife was forced to give bond for 100 l. Scots, for having a child baptized by a preſbyterian miniſter. I have not room to mention what he ſuffered by the quartering of ſoldiers, &c. And therefore I proceed.

The circuit of Ayr ſat down in the beginning of October. The judges were the earl of Mar, lord Livingſtone, and lieutenant-general Drummond, afterwards viſcount of Strathallan.

After the rolls were called in the preſence of the heritors each of the lords made a ſpeech, recommending to theſe gentlemen to concert proper meaſures for wiping off the odium of diſloyalty the ſhire of Ayr in general lay under. The deſign of this was to get them to raiſe money, and bring them to comply with the teſt, and the other meaſures of the court. The thing took; and Drummond, who poſſeſſed the forfeited eſtate of Keiſland, was deſired to aſſiſt them with his advice. The lieutenant-general pretending a great regard for their welfare and the happineſs of the country, gave it as his opinion, that the beſt way for ſhewing their loyalty, and procuring an indemnity for paſt crimes, was to make a voluntary offer to take the teſt. He told them, that though the law confined it to thoſe who had places of truſt, yet their loyalty would appear by petitioning the lords commiſſioners to adminiſter it unto them. When this propoſal was made ſeveral withdrew, and they who ſtayed complied with it: upon which a form of a petition was drawn up; three copies were writ for the three diſtricts of the ſhire. Upon this the lords ſeparated, one to the body of the church, another to the iſle, and a third to another place. Then the heritors, according to the reſpective diſtricts, were called. The queſtion put to each was, Will you ſign the petition, or not? They who ſigned it were diſmiſſed, and the recuſants where ordered to continue where they were, without being allowed either meat or drink; for, ſays my author, it would ſeem they intended to ſhave them into loyalty: but the lords, being aſhamed of this indiſcreet treatment of ſo many innocent perſons of rank, allowed them to come out of the church, and confined them to the town. Next the commiſſioners proceeded to adminiſter the teſt to thoſe that had ſigned the petition; but finding that ſome of them, upon ſecond thoughts, had changed their mind, and refuſed, they were ſo enraged that they ſent them to priſon, and ſome of them to that naſty place called the thieves hole; as Montgomery of Bordland and others, who had neither room to ſit nor ſtand upright. The equity of this proceeding, after they were told that the law obliged none to take the teſt but thoſe in places of truſt under the government, muſt be left with the reader. After this the recuſants had indictments given them, conſiſting of many crimes, of which many of them were incapable. For ſome young men who had no families, but lived with their parents, were charged with reſet and converſe; and others unmarried, who had no children, were accuſed of irregular marriages and baptiſms. Theſe indicted gentlemen were ranged into ſeveral diviſions; and ſuch as they ſaw proper were ordered to be examined by the officers and ſubalterns of Mar's regiment then lying in Ayr. Some of theſe officers, as lieutenant-colonel Buchan, afterwards turned papiſts. From the report of theſe deputies it appeared that ſeveral were able to purge themſelves by oath of the crimes laid to their charge, though others could not: yet all of them were treated as guilty, and were all called again before the lords, and had a new offer of the teſt, as the only way to clear their innocence. Several complied through the importunity of their friends. They who ſtill kept their ground were brought, one after another, before the commiſſioners, and were ſtill urged to take the teſt, and upon their refuſal, though they had nothing elſe they could prove againſt them, were committed priſoners

to

to that room in the tolbooth or prison of Ayr, called the Council-house, where they remained, crouded together, without fire, or any proper accomodations, till at last the lords were pleased to dismiss them upon exorbitant bail above the value of their estates, to appear at Edinburgh when called.

All the indulged presbyterian ministers in this shire were called before this infamous circuit, and, upon their refusing the test, were ordered to oblige themselves not to exercise any part of their ministry until they had allowance from the king and council. One or two complied; but the rest, who absolutely refused, were sent to the Bass, and other prisons, where they endured many hardships: and by this means the orthodox clergy got free of most of the presbyterian ministers in the west.

In order to frighten the country people, and some young gentlemen, into the test, a gibbet was erected at the cross. The lords used to say, Yonder tree will make you take the test. One day the earl of Mar said to a young gentleman recusant, pointing to the gibbet, Will not that shake your resolution? No, my lord, answered the other, if I am to be hanged, I expect so much advantage, by my birth and quality, as to hang at the cross of Edinburgh, and betwixt this and Edinburgh I may think what to do. In short, all recusants were disarmed; none were allowed to get out of their parishes without a certificate from the prelatical incumbent; all were discharged from being at field-conventicles upon pain of death. All who were blamed with reset and converse behoved either to take the test, or go to prison.

Before I leave the circuit at Ayr I must mention two instances of particular severities. A poor country man was charged with being at Bothwell, and sentence was going to be passed: but lord Livingstone, president at that time, told him, That if he would but answer one question, the sentence should not be pronounced. The question was, do you own the king's authority, or not? The man answered distinctly, My lord, I do own the king's authority, so far as he acts by, and is grounded on the word of God. The president said again, I ask thee, man, do you own the authority, of king Charles II. yea, or no? To which he replied, I do own the authority of king Charles II. as he acts conform to the word of God, and grounds his power thereupon. The question was several times repeated, and the honest man, not giving any other answer, was ordered to be hanged at the cross of Ayr in a few hours; but by the intercession of some ladies, he was reprieved and carried in to Edinburgh. Here was a sentence of death passed upon a poor man, because he could not see that the king had authority without any foundation on a divine law!

The other instances is of Quintin Dick, a feuar of Dalmellington, Vol. I. p. 470) who, being required to swear upon the common ensnaring questions, answered, That rising in arms in self defence, and entering into leagues and covenants without consent of the magistrate, were controverted points, and he could not give his oath upon them. Then they urged him to take oath of allegiance. Upon which he declared, that he owned the king's authority in things civil, and was ready to swear it; but supremacy in things ecclesiastical was such an usurpation upon Christ's kingdom, that he was a better friend to the king than to wish him it. Whereupon he was fined in 1000 l. sterling and ordered to be banished to the plantations. His goods were immediately seized, his house converted to a guard house, and himself cast into one of the worst places of the prison, among thieves and murderers. When he was carried to Edinburgh he disowned the societies declaration of war before the council, for he thought these zealous people carried matters too far; however, he remained in prison till he was sent, with others to Dunnoter. The reflections he made on his sufferings the reader will find in Mr Wodrow's history.

The last circuit-court I am to speak of is that of Glasgow, which sat down the 14th October, Alexander Ross D. D. professor of divinity there, preached a sermon before them, which breathed forth nothing but slaughter and persecution. His text was, Acts xvi. 28. 'Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian.' In discoursing upon it he proposed, 1. to shew the parties of our divided Zion; 2 the malignancy of the national sin of schism; 3. the necessity of episcopacy for supporting the main concerns of Christianity; and lastly, the application. How far a discourse of this nature was founded on this text, or agreeable to the spirit of the gospel, is easy for any to determine.

The loyal heritors of Stirling shire, which was within the bounds of this circuit, presented an humble address to the judges, viz. the duke of Hamilton, lord Lundin and lord Collingtoun; in which they declared their readiness to contribute in the supply of the three months cess yearly, for two years ensuing, to be paid at Martinmas and Whitsunday next, by equal portions, besides the supply granted by the current parliament.

They likewise delivered a bond of regularity, under their hands, in which they obliged themselves, families, tenants, and subtenants, &c. to live regularly and orderly according to act of parliament; to suppress all disorders, by taking and delivering the offenders to justice, if in their power; to give timely notice to the next magistrate or officer of the army, and concur with them in apprehending any fugitives, vagrant preachers, &c, to frequent their own parish churches, unless lawfully hindered, and partake of the Lord's supper, unless they satisfy their minister of their present unfitness; to deliver up to the magistrates such of their tenants or cottars, &c. as shall refuse to partake of that sacrament unless they satisfy the minister for their neglect; to baptize and marry with none but their own parish ministers, without their consent, to pay the cess above mentioned, &c, &c. This was a most extensive bond. The reader will make his own reflexions upon it.

But the heritors of Renfrew and Lanerk were not so pliable; for they generally refused the test, declined the bond of regularity, and so were obliged to endure the hardships of a prison, not a few of them for the space of 16 months. William Dalziel of Redmire died in prison, and, with difficulty, was suffered to be buried, with his ancestors, in the church yard of Camnethan.

The treatment of some heritors in the parish of Lochwinnoch was peculiar. About two Sabbaths before the lords came to Glasgow, the sheriff officer stood at the church door, and ordered all the heritors of the parish to appear before the lords. Robert Orr of Millibank, James Allison portioner of Kerrs, John Orr of Jamperstock, James Ramsay portioner of Auchinhow, James Orr of Hills, Robert Semple of Balgreen, William Orr portioner of Keans, and William Blackburn of Lauristoun, were, for their not complying, obliged to walk on foot through frost and snow, with about 40 other prisoners, to Stirling; where, notwithstanding their fatigue and want of refreshment, they were forced into three low vaults under ground without fire or light, or any thing to ly on, or conveniency for easing nature; and had not some good people taken compassion on them, by sending them straw, coals and victuals, their case had still been more wretched. Being told that they were to be sent to America, their friends gave them money; but the soldiers took it all from them. They continued at Stirling till May next year, when they were taken out, tyed two and two, and sent into the prison of the Canongate, from whence some of them were ordered to Dunnoter, where they endured unaccountable hardships. Thus much for these arbitrary circuits, from which the reader will easily form a judgment of the state of the country. These were the golden days of the mild administration of Charles II!

Bishop Burnet gives but a very general account of these infamous courts, which he concludes by telling us, 'That the severity which the presbyterians formerly had used, forcing all people to take their covenant, was now returned back on them in this test, that they were thus forced to take.' But that the presbyterians forced all people to take the covenant, is not matter of fact; for in the covenant period, there were many debarred from the covenant and communion, and none who were thus debarred were admitted, but only those who, after exact trial, were found to have given sufficient evidence of the sincerity of their repentance. I find a modern author challenging his antagonist to give an instance of any that suffered ſuffered, either confiſcation of goods, baniſhment, or death, for their refuſing the covenant; ſo that no compariſon can be made here.

I find by the Cloud of Witneſſes, that James Lawſon and Alexander Wood ſuffered at Glaſgow on the 24th of October this year. Whether it was in conſequence of a ſentence of the circuit court there, I know not. Their joint teſtimony is in the above collection, to which I muſt refer the reader.

The council at Edinburgh was not idle during theſe things. On the 9th of October W. Niven and John Hodge were ordered for tranſportation, becauſe they would not take the oath of allegiance and ſupremacy, ſubmit to prelacy, and own Bothwell bridge to be rebellion. They allowed phyſicians to viſit James Hamilton of Aikenhead, though one might have been expected, ſince nonconformity was the only crime for which he was confined, they might have ſuffered him to go out upon bail.

The ſtate of the weſt and ſouth of Scotland was now diſmal, and the old followers of Mr Cargil, who had united in ſocieties for general correſpondence, and made choice of Mr Renwick for their miniſter, were in one eſpecial manner expoſed to the vengeance of the government. The ſea ports were ſhut up that they could not get out of the kingdom; they were purſued by the bloody and mercileſs ſoldiers; the whole country was ſworn to diſcover them, and bound up from giving them meat, drink, or lodging: ſecret intelligencers were hired to find out their lurking places, and any who were inclined to do them the leaſt kindneſs. They were put from under the protection of the laws of their country; no terms were allowed them but a renouncing of their principles, and, ſwallowing thoſe oaths by which thouſands were involved in the horrid guilt of perjury.

Under theſe dreadful circumſtances, on the 15th October they met among themſelves, along with Mr James Renwick their miniſter, and propoſed to emit a declaration againſt the wickedneſs and ſeverities uſed by their perſecutors, Mr Renwick was at firſt averſe to the propoſal, fearing the ſad effects it might produce; but conſidering that the neceſſity of the caſe admitted no delay, he was prevailed with to conſent, concur, and aſſiſt in the publication of it. The paper was drawn up by him and agreed on the 28th, and the following is a ſhort abſtract of it.

The apologetic declaration and admonitory vindication of the true Preſbyterians of the Church of Scotland, eſpecially anent intelligencers and informers.

ALBEIT we know that the people of God, in all ages have been cruelly perſecuted,——yet ſuch hard uſage——hath not, at leaſt ought not, to have abated the zeal of tender hearted Chriſtians, in the proſecution of holy and commanded duties; therefore, as hitherto, we have not been driven to lay aſide neceſſary obliging duties, becauſe of the viperous threatnings of men,——ſo we declare our firm reſolution of conſtant adherence to our Covenants and engagements, ——and——to our faithful declarations, wherein we have diſowned the authority of Charles Stuart (not authority of God's inſtitution, either among Heathens or Chriſtians) and all authority depending upon him——and wherein alſo we have declared war againſt him and his accomplices;——therefore,——we do hereby teſtify and declare, That as we utterly deteſt and abhor that helliſh principle of killing all who differ in judgment and perſuaſion from us;——ſo we look upon it as a duty,——to publiſh——unto the world, that, for as much as we are firmly and really purpoſed not to injure or offend any whomſoever, but to purſue the end of our Covenants, in ſtanding to the defence of our glorious Work of Reformation, and of our own lives; yet, (we ſay) we do hereby declare unto all, that whoſoever ſtretcheth forth their hands againſt us,——by ſhedding our blood actually, either by authorative commanding, ſuch as bloody counſellors,——eſpecially that called juſticiary, general of forces, adjutants, captains, lieutenants, and all in civil and military power, who make it their work to embrue their hands in our blood; or by obeying ſuch commands, ſuch as bloody militia-men, malicious troopers, &c. likeways ſuch gentlemen and commons, who——ride and run with the foreſaid perſons, to lay ſearch for us, or who deliver any of us into their hand, to the ſpilling of our blood; by inticing morally, or ſtirring up enemies to the taking away of our lives;——by informing againſt us wickedly, wittingly and willingly, ſuch as viperous and malicious biſhops and curates, and all ſuch ſort of intelligencers, who——raiſe the Hue and Cry after us;——we ſay all, and every one of ſuch, ſhall be reputed by us as enemies to God and the covenanted Work of reformation, and puniſhed as ſuch according to our power and the degree of their offence, chiefly, if they ſhall continue, after the publication of this our declaration, obſtinately and habitually, with malice, to proceed againſt us any of the foreſaid ways.—Finally, we do hereby declare, that we abhor, condemn and diſcharge any perſonal attempts, upon any pretext whatſomever, without previous deliberation, common or competent conſent, without certain probation by ſufficient witneſſes, the guilty perſons confeſſion, or the notoriouſneſs of the deeds themſelves. Inhibiting alſo and diſcharging any of our emiſſaries whatſomever, to ſtretch forth their hands beyond the certainly known degrees of any of the foreſaid perſons their offences.——Therefore let all theſe foreſaid perſons be admoniſhed of their hazard. And particularly all ye intelligencers, who, by your voluntary informations, endeavour to render us up to the enemies hands, that our blood may be ſhed,——we deſire you to take warning;——for the ſinleſs neceſſity of ſelf-preſervation, accompanied with holy zeal for Chriſt's reigning in our land, and ſuppreſſing of profanity, will move us not to let you paſs unpuniſhed;——not becauſe we are acted by a ſinful ſpirit of revenge for private and perſonal injuries, but mainly becauſe, by our fall, reformation ſuffers damage. ——And as——we have here declared our purpoſes anent malicious injurers of us, ſo——we heartily beſeech and obteſt all you, who wiſh well to Sion, to ſhew your good will towards us, by acting with us, ——for this great work of holding up the ſtandard of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. Think not that, in any ways, you are called to ly by neutral and indifferent, eſpecially in ſuch a day; for we are a people by holy Covenants dedicated unto the Lord.——And, moreover, we are fully perſuaded, that the Lord, who now hideth himſelf from the houſe of Jacob, will ſuddenly appear, bring light out of darkneſs, perfect ſtrength out of weakneſs, and cauſe judgment return again to righteouſneſs——Given at upon the 28th of October, 1684.

'Let King Jeſus reign, and all his enemies be ſcattered.'

They ordered copies of this declaration to be affixed to a ſufficient number of market croſſes and church doors on the 8th of next month, which was done accordingly.

In the Informatory Vindication, they diſtinguiſh between a declaration of a hoſtile war and martial inſurrection, and declaring a war of contradiction and oppoſition by teſtimonies. As for the former, to uſe their own words, 'they looked upon that only to be declared againſt the tyrant, and ſuch as ſhould riſe with him in arms, muſtering themſelves under his banner, diſplayed againſt the cauſe and people of God, for deſtroying the covenanted Work of Reformation, and extirpating all the owners of it; but as for the latter, it was declared againſt all ſuch as any way ſtrengthen, ſide with, or acknowledge the ſaid tyrant, or any other in the like tyranny and uſurpation, civil or eccleſiaſtic, not that they would martially oppoſe and riſe up againſt all ſuch, but that, by their profeſſion, practice and teſtimony, they would contradict and oppoſe them and their profeſſion and practice as to that thing.' And it appears, from the declaration itſelf, that it was a war in their own defence, againſt thoſe who maliciouſly and wickedly thirſted for their blood. They declared their abhorrence of all private revenge and aſſaſſination. It is alſo plain, that that, though they disclaimed the tyrannical government of that time, they still owned magistracy and all lawful authority. How far it was prudent in them to publish this threatning declaration in that conjuncture, is not for me to determine. However, this is certain, that though it exasperated the managers to more vigorous measures yet it wanted not its effect; for it struck a terror among malignant informers and intelligencers, and the most virulent and persecuting curates of Nithsdale and Galloway thought proper to retire into other places for a time; and indeed their view in this paper was not so much action, as the threatening of some people they had to do with; and if any look upon it as an unjustifiable piece of extremity, they ought to consider their circumstances, and the illegal and barbarous oppressions they were under in being in a manner 'killed all the day long, and counted as sheep for the slaughter.' I shall relate the consequences of this in their proper order.

Mean while on the 26th of October, William Hanna, in the parish of Tunnergath in Annandale, having been apprehended in England by colonel Dacres, was received by one Sprinkel in his troop. He lay in irons at Dumfries, and at last was confined in a dark pit under the Canongate prison. The soldiers who brought him his small pittance of meat and drink, said, Seek mercy from heaven, for we have none to give you, with other expressions of blasphemy. He continued in this place nine days, and then was brought up to the prison, where he remained till he was sent with others to Dunnoter His only crime was non comformity, for which he had in the preceeding year suffered greatly. His son William, not 16 years of age, was in 1682, taken by a party of soldiers, though he was afflicted with the ague, and forced to walk a-foot for some days along with them. Coming to the grave of one who had been shot, and buried in the fields, they set him down on the grave, and, covering his face, threatened him with immediate death if he would not promise regularity, &c. The boy told them, God sent him to the world, and had appointed his time to go out of it, only he was determined to swear nothing he reckoned sinful. He was now in their power, and they might do as they would. In the year 1683, he was taken to Edinburgh. and after several examinations, was tortured with the thumbkins, and then loaded with irons, which were so strait that his flesh swelled out above them; and after a year and a half's imprisonment, he was transported and sold in Barbadoes. It is said, he returned after the revolution, and was a minister in Scarborough.

The orthodox clergy was amongst the main diligent informers, and their informations were sometimes followed with peculiar cruelties, of which the treatment of one Robert Watson, in the parish of Badernock, near Glasgow, is a glaring instance. While this good man was confined to his bed by a paralytic disorder, Mr Stirling the curate informed against him as a disaffected person; whereupon about eight at night, a party came to his house, put one of his horses in a sledge, took him and the couch whereon he lay, and laid him across the sledge, with his head and feet lying over it, and in that posture carried him to Glasgow that same night, though the rain was exceeding great. But when Robert was examined, he was dismissed, and the soldiers cursed the curate for putting them to so much trouble. About the same time Mr James Gilchrist, chaplain to the laird of Glorat, was made prisoner. But passing these things, I shall now relate other unprecedented branches of tyranny and oppression in

CHAP. XI.

Of the proceedings of the council and justiciary: the murders in the fields: the trial and execution of Mr Robert Bailie of Jervifwood, and others: with several other branches of persecution to the death of king Charles II.

THE persecution of this period is still on the growing hand, as will appear from a relation of matters of fact in the order of time when they happened. Many worthy and excellent gentlemen suffered exceedingly, by exorbitant fines and long imprisonment, during the months of November and December. The most of them, if not all, had been before the circuits upon sham indictments. among others, these following suffered exceedingly, viz. Sir John Maxwell of Nether-pollock, the lairds of Craigends elder and younger, the laird of Douchal, the laird of Pulwood, Z. Maxwell of Blawarthill, brother to Nether Pollock, Mr J. Pollock of Balgray, and J. Caldwell laird of Caldwell, from the shire of Renfrew. The lairds of Allanton and Halcraig, Mr Andrew afterwards Sir Andrew Kennedy of Clowburn, the lairds of Overtoun, Hartwood, Browncastle and Bradisholm, James Young chamberlane of Evandale, Mr John Bannantyne of Corehouse, after the revolution minister at Lanerk, and Bannantyne of Craigmuir from the shire of Renerk, Sir James Montgomery of Skermorly, Sir Adam Whiteford, Cuningham of Athenyards, and others from the shire of Ayr, Mr Hugh Maxwell of Dalswinton, and the laird of Balmagechan, from Dumfries and Galloway. There were other gentlemen exorbitantly fined for the same caute with these now mentioned, as the lairds of Riddel, Greenhead, Wall, and Chatto, lord Cranstoun, Sir William Scot of Harden, senior and junior; but whether at this precise time I cannot say. The managers wanted to finger their estates; and, as they had nothing to lay to their charge but non conformity, false indictments were trumpt up against them, and the test contrary to law was pressed upon them, which they knew they would not take; and therefore they were thus illegally fined, and several of them suffered a tedious imprisonment.

On the 8th of November the apologetical declaration was fixed on several church doors in Nithsdale, Galloway, Ayr, and Lanerk shire.

On the 11th J. Hutchilon, portioner in Newbottle, was in absence, condemned to be executed, when apprehended, for being at Pentland and Bothwell, the time and place to be appointed by the council. The same day copies of the above declaration were brought to the council, by which they were exasperated to the last degree; so that, instead of acting like grave and solid counsellors, they discovered themselves to be under the influence of a spirit of rage and cruelty; for not only they who were taken up on suspicion, but even they who were already in prison, were barbarously used on this very account.

The same day, about six in the evening, W. Niven smith in the parish of Eastwood, and several others, were brought from the iron house before the council or their committee; and being interrogated by the chancellor whether they knew any thing of the treasonable papers that had been affixed to the church-doors, declared they did not. Then they were asked if they owned the matter of them; and answered, They knew nothing about them, and so could neither own nor disown them. The clerk, upon this, read the declaration as fast as he could. Upon which they declared they could make no judgment of it upon hearing of it in such a manner. They were again required to disown it upon the highest pains. They answered they had no share in it, and could not take upon them to judge of what noways concerned them. After they were removed a little, they were called in, and told they were sentenced to die that night at ten o'clock: but something came in the way that prevented the execution of this unaccountable sentence.

On the 13th John Semple of Craigthorn, in the parish of Glasford, was taken and brought before the council, on suspicion of being accessory to the above apologetic declaration, and was ordered immediately to be examined by the thumb screw and the boots, or both, which he endured, and the torture was repeated next day. And the same day Robert Goodwin and other prisoners were brought before them on suspicion. They declared they knew nothing of it. When it was read to them in a hurry, they were ordered solemnly to swear that they neither adhered to it, nor knew the authors of it. Robert declared, in the name of the rest, that they never heard it till now, and knew nothing about the forming of it: but, because they would not swear, they were immediately sent to the iron-house.

On the 14th John Semple, John Watt and Gabriel Thomson

Thomſon were condemned and executed at the Gallow-lee, becauſe they owned, or refuſed to diſown, the above mentioned paper. This was quick work, there being but a few hours between their ſentence and their death. The poor men were ſcarce ſuffered to pray. The ſpectators were ſurrounded by the ſoldiers; and, refuſing to anſwer upon oath the queſtions put to them, ten or twelve were carried from the ſcaffold to priſon: nay, becauſe three coffins were ſeen carrying down the ſtreet to receive their bodies, the council ordered Sir William Paterſon to make inquiry by whom they were made.

Next day Thomas Abercromby, in the pariſh of Bar, was apprehended at midnight in his own houſe, and carried away priſoner without any cauſe aſſigned. His houſe was rifled by the ſoldiers; and it coſt him a great deal of money before he got off. His loſſes before this, and ſufferings afterwards, were not ſmall.

On the 20th the advocate was ordered to proſecute John Porterfield of Douchal for high treaſon, though they had no more to lay to his charge than to that of ſome of the reſt: but this was done to bring him into their meaſures.

The ſame day Thomas Kennoway and one Duncan Stuart were both killed, by perſons unknown, at Swine-abbay in the pariſh of Livingſtone. I cannot relate the circumſtances, as none were preſent but the actors, who were never apprehended. The ſocieties were ſo far from approving this, that they refuſed to admit ſome perſons among them whom they ſuſpected to be concerned in it, all ſuch aſſaſſinations being contrary to their apologetical declaration. It is indeed certain that Kennoway was one of the greateſt oppreſſors, and a terror to the country. I ſhall not trouble the reader with particulars. The widows of theſe two were by the council recommended to the treaſury for charity.

A ſtrict ſearch was ordered to be made through the city of Edinburgh for thoſe concerned in the murder, and the above mentioned declaration. The council then made their bloody act, impowering the ſoldiers to kill in the fields all who would not anſwer their queries. This was ſuch an unprecedented ſtep, that none would believe it, was it not recorded in their own regiſters, to their everlaſting diſgrace. Thus the matter ſtands.

Apud Edinburgh, November 22. 1684.

Sederunt Chancellor, Regiſter, Advocate, &c.

THE query under-written, propoſed by the lords of his majeſty's privy council to the lords of his majeſty's council and ſeſſion, with their anſwer, is ordered to be recorded.

Query. Whether any of his majeſty's ſubjects, being queſtioned by his majeſty's judges, or commiſſioners, if they own a late proclomation, in ſo far as it declares war againſt his ſacred majeſty, and aſſerts that it is lawful to kill all thoſe who are employed by his majeſty, refuſing to anſwer upon oath, are thereby guilty of high-treaſon, and art and part in the ſaid declaration?

Anſwer. 'It is the unanimous opinion of the lords of council and ſeſſion, that a libel, in the terms of the ſaid query, is relevant to infer the crime of treaſon, as art and part of the ſaid treaſonable declaration, againſt the refuſers,' Subſcribed by Perth Chancellor, David Falconer, George MacKenzie, &c.

'It being put to the vote in council, whether or not any perſons who owns, or will not diſown the late traiterous declaration upon oath, whether they have arms or not, ſhould be immediately killed before two witneſſes, and the perſon or perſons who are to have inſtructions from the council for that effect?' Carried in the affirmative.

'The lords of his majeſty's privy-council do hereby ordain any perſon who owns, or will not diſown the late treaſonable declaration upon oath, whether they have arms or not, to be immediately put to death; this being always done in preſence of two witneſſes, and the perſon or perſons having commiſſion for that effect.'

By the anſwer to the query the refuſers were to be indicted; but, by this act of counſel, they are to be immediately put to death without any indictment. How far then the act is founded on the anſwer muſt be referred to thoſe learned in the law; and how Sir George MacKenzie had the confidence to vindicate this is very ſurpriſing. As for the commiſſioners ſpoke of, this is certain, that majors, captains, and even ſoldiers, pretended to act by virtue of it, and certainly they were much encouraged by it,

The day after this bloody act the council gave a commiſſion to Lord Livingſtone, Lord Roſs, Lord Torpichen, &c. or any five of them, to try, judge and execute in the pariſh where Kennoway and Stuart were murdered; and, together with the commiſſion, inſtructions were given to the forces ſent to the pariſhes of Livingſtone, Bathgate, Torpichen and Calders, of which I give the following abbreviate. 'You ſhall convocate all the inhabitants——above fourteen years of age, in the pariſh of Livingſtone, &c. and examine every perſon; and, after the oath of abjuration, [of which in its place,] ſuch as take the oath you ſhall diſmiſs, unleſs you ſuſpect their guilt. And, if any own the late traiterous declaration or aſſaſſination, you ſhall execute them by military execution on the place. And ſuch as refuſe to anſwer or depone, or will not diſown the ſaid, &c. you ſhall give them a libel inſtantly, call fifteen men as a jury, and let them judge them, and inſtantly execute the ſentence of death on ſuch as do refuſe to diſown, or to anſwer the queſtions before the ſaid jury.——And as to the families of ſuch as you thus condemn and execute, you ſhall make priſoners of all perſons in their families above the age of twelve years in order to tranſportation ——For all which this ſhall be warrant to you, and all officers and ſoldiers employed by you' Subſcribed by Perth chancellor, Douglas, Balcarras, George MacKenzie, &c.—— There were ſeveral other inſtructions. I have only ſingled out theſe, and the reader may ſee, that the murders in the fields, which were committed after this, had now the ſanction of authority; neither ſhall I detain him by any reflections of mine, but leave him to his own.

The above mentioned judges ſat firſt at Livingſtone, where many queſtions were put to ſeveral people, concerning the king's authority, their keeping the church, and other things quite foreign to the deſigned inquiry. The ſoldiers ſat on horſeback, with their ſwords drawn, and ſurrounded the country people in the fields. The old and infirm, who had not been from their houſes for many years, were forced to attend. And they who could not walk, were brought out on horſeback; nay, they who could not ſit, ſays my author, were tyed to one another on horſeback, and none were permitted to go home till they were examined by the judges, or rather inquiſitors. But I paſs theſe things.

On the 25th the council approved of the following draught of the oath of abjuration, to be offered to whom they or their commiſſioners ſhould think fit. 'I A. B. do hereby abhor, renounce and diſown, in the preſence of the almighty God, the pretended declaration of war lately affixed at ſeveral pariſh churches, in ſo far as it declares a war againſt his ſacred majeſty, and aſſerts that it is lawful to kill ſuch as ſerve his majeſty, in church, ſtate, army, or country, or ſuch an act againſt the authors of the pretended declaration now ſhewn to me. And I do hereby utterly renounce and diſown the villainous authors thereof, who did as they call it, ſtatute and ordain the ſame, and what is therein mentioned. And I ſwear I ſhall never aſſiſt the authors of the ſaid pretended declaration, or their emiſſaries or adherents, in any point of puniſhing, killing, or making of war any manner of way, as I ſhall anſwer to God.' This was the firſt form of the abjuration. We ſhall find it much curtailed afterwards, and therefore I ſhall make no remarks on it here.

Next day the council made an act ordering new elections to be made for next ſeſſion of parliament, which was to meet in March next, in the room of thoſe who were diſqualified by an act of the laſt ſeſſion (my author thinks it it was the test act) and by their being under process for treason. As the parliament was to sit, it was but proper that the members should be such as would pursue the measures of the ministry.

At last the design against all the indulged ministers was accomplished; for on the 27th of November the council ordered them all to be ejected because they had not kept their instructions, vol. I. p. 351. and some of them had not observed the fast appointed in September last; and, by the instructions given to the commissioners in different shires, they were obliged, December the 2d, to give bond not to exercise any part of their ministry in Scotland. Some of them had before this been imprisoned because they would not comply with this, as Mr Anthony Murray, and Mr J. Curry. The Rev. Mr John Carstairs, perceiving this storm a-coming wrote to the chancellor for his lordship's pass to leave Scotland. He died soon after, and so got out of the reach of his enemies. Not a few were imprisoned after this, as Mr Ralph Rogers, Mr William Tullidaff, Mr Robert Boyd, Mr Robert Duncanson, Mr Duncan Campbell, Mr John Greg, Mr James Hutchison, Mr Andrew Millar, Mr Peter Kid, Mr John Knox, Mr Walter Mowat, &c. There were but few that complied. Thus the prelates got rid of those who were great eye sores to them.

On the 28th the gentlemen from Renfrew were, except the laird of Douchal, summoned to appear before the council on the 2d of December next.

Next day J. Porterfield of Douchal was indicted before the justiciary for high treason, because he did not reveal Sir John Cochran's proposal for charity to Argyll, and had conversed with his own brother who had been forfeited for the affair of Pentland, and had harboured one George Holmes who had been at Bothwell. He owned that Sir John Cochran had asked 50 l. by way of charity to the earl of Argyll; but that the proposal was made with so much indifference, that he did not think it worth his while to reveal it. As for conversing with his brother, he thought there was no harm in it, because some years after Pentland he had lived peaceably in the shire of Renfrew, and had conversed with his majesty's subjects of all ranks, such as privy councellors, the sheriff of the shire, and the officers of the army; from whence it was generally concluded that he was indemnified, &c. As to George Holmes, he declared, that, whenever he understood that his name was in the portcous-roll of the court of Glasgow 1679, though he was no tenant of his, he obliged his father to put him off his ground; that the said Holmes had afterwards made up his matters, and listed himself a soldier in the king's army. But though this was the plain state of the case, yet he was brought in guilty of treason, and condemned to be executed when and where the king should appoint.

This sentence drew compassion and tears from many of the spectators, to behold such a good old man meet with so much injustice; and it is said that even Sir Geo. MacKenzie threw the blame of this from himself, and called this gentleman Lord Melford's Martyr. The truth is, Melford had a previous promise of his estate. Such instances as this, says my author, verified the black character which a person of merit and honour gave him of this period. 'This was a time when stretches of obsolete laws, knights of the post, half or no probation malicious informers, scandalous rogues and miscreants, were the governments tools, to ruin men of estates, honour and principle.' I would farther observe, that, the day before his trial, the lords of council and session gave their judgment of this gentleman's case, viz. That the concealing and not revealing, in the case foresaid is treason; so that, how far the same persons could in equity give their judgment over again in the same cause, I must leave to these learned in the law. This gentleman was not executed; however, he was obliged to give security to the earl of Melford for 50,000 merks, and a gratuity of 100 guineas to his lady. The half of the sum was paid to him, though Douchal was his cousin. The revolution prevented the payment of the other half. The principal informer against him was John Maxwell of Overmains, a neighbour and relation, who had no other way of atoning for the crimes of adultery but by turning informer. I shall only add, that this Maxwell came to ruin, while the family of Douchal was not only restored to its own paternal inheritance, but also purchased the estate of the wicked informer.

On the 22d of December the gentlemen of Renfrew were fined in the following sums, viz.

	L.	s.	d.
Sir John Maxwell of Nether-Pollock,	8000	0	0

These sums being English money, make in all, - - -	19797	15	6

The laird of Caldwell and Zacharias Maxwell were ordered to be prisoners for life, besides the payment of their fine. They were pleased to make some abatement of the fines of the rest. Thus Sir John Maxwell was to pay 5000 l. the lairds of Craigends 4000 l. the laird of Fulwood 1666 l. 13 s. 4 d. and the laird of Balgray of 500 l. sterling. The greatest crimes for which these gentlemen were fined in this exorbitant manner, were their not attending ordinances in their own parish church, their hearing presbyterian ministers, and pretended converse with rebels. It was falsely alledged that they had contributed money to the murderers of the primate. For the like crimes the following gentlemen were fined, viz.

These sheriff fines were all confirmed by the council, and some of the councellors shared largely in the spoils of these constructed criminals. Sir George McKenzie the advocate got 1500 l. of Sir William Scot of Harden's fine. The duke of Gordon and the marquis of Athol shared Sir William Scot of Harden junior's fine between them. I shall leave the reader to make his own reflections on these proceedings, when I have only observed, that none of these gentlemen had ever declared against the government that then was, though perhaps few had cause to stand up for it, unless it were the plunderers of those who were more righteous than themselves.

On the said 2d of December, the council sent a letter to the commissioners of the several districts in the south and west shires, signifying, that, as the king had granted an indemnity on the 26th of February last, they thought proper to send instructions relating to it. But why no mention was made of this indemnity till now, is not to be accounted for. But the instructions concerning it rendered it altogether uſeleſs ſince none were to have the benefit of it but thoſe that would ſwear the oath of abjuration, and that they would never take arms againſt the king, or any commiſſioned by him, upon any pretence whatſoever. Beſides it was only to be of uſe to thoſe under the degree of heritors, liferenters, &c. and vagrant preachers, by which indulged miniſters and preachers, not licenſed according to law, were to be underſtood; ſo that the inſtructions rendered the indemnity of no uſe.

On the 3d the council recommended to the advocate to return their thanks to Judge Jeffreys for his kind concurrence with them, againſt thoſe pernicious rogues and villains who diſturbed the public peace, and to deſire him to order hiding and fugitive Scotchmen to be apprehended and delivered up, on the Scots border, to ſuch as ſhould be appointed to receive them. It cannot ſupriſe the reader to ſee a correſpondence between bloody Jeffreys and theſe bloody Scots inquiſitors; for birds of a feather flock together.

The ſame day they ordered the advocate to raiſe a proceſs of forfeiture before the enſuing parliament, upon a charge of ſixty days, againſt the following perſons, viz. Denholm of Weſtfields, Stuart of Caltneſs, Sir John Cochran of Ochiltree, James Stuart ſon to Sir James Stuart of Goodtrees, the Lord Melvil, Sir Patrick Hume of Polwart, George Pringle of Torwoodlie, Andrew Fletcher of Saltoun, Hume of Baſſenden, the heirs of Mr Martin late clerk of the juſtice-court, the heirs of the late Earl of London, Thomas Hay of Park, Sir James Dalrymple of Stair, Walter Lockhart of Kirkton, Montgomery of Langſhaw, John Weir of Newton, Mr Gilbert Eliot writer in Edinburgh, Campbel of Ardkinglaſs, Ceſnock elder and younger, and Jerviſwood. We ſhall meet with them again in their proper place, and find that the laſt mentioned gentleman was hurried off the ſtage before that time; for that inſatiable thirſt of the managers for his blood muſt be ſatisfied.

On the 4th, not thinking the many commiſſions formerly given, ſufficient for ſuppreſſing the poor ſufferers, whom they branded with the odious names of rogues and villains, the council conſtituted Lieutenant general Drummond a juſtice of peace, and impowered him to repair to the ſouth and weſt ſhires, and hold courts of juſticiary, and to take along with him a ſufficient number of the forces, in order to purſue and apprehend the rebels and their abettors, that they may be brought to trial, and to paſs ſentence upon them as he ſhould ſee cauſe. They likeways ordered him to quarter the ſoldiers and ſettle garriſons where he ſhould find it expedient, eſpecially in Lanerk-ſhire. At the ſame time they wrote to the Duke of Hamilton, acquainting him with all this, and deſiring his grace to aſſemble the commiſſioners who were proper to provide the garriſons with all neceſſaries.

Beſides theſe powers to the lieutenant general, other commiſſions were given to ſuch private perſons as would undertake them; particularly, William Hamilton, Laird of Orbiſtoun had a commiſſion, on the 8th of December, 'to levy 200 Highlandmen of the ſhire of Dumbarton, and with them or any part of them, as oft as our ſervice ſhall require, to march into any part of theſe ſhires [Dumbarton and Renfrew] and purſue, take, and apprehend the ſaid rebels, and fugitives, &c. and their reſetters, and commit them to ſome firmance, or ward, till they be legally tried, and in caſe any of the ſaid perſons be in arms, reſiſting and refuſing to be taken, we do hereby impower the ſaid Orbiſtoun, &c. to kill, wound and deſtroy them; and deliver ſuch of theſe as ſhall be taken alive to their next commiſſioned officer, to be brought in priſoner to——Edinburgh.——And——we authorize the ſaid laird of Orbiſtoun, to employ ſpies and intelligencers to go in company with the ſaid rebels and fugitives, as if they were in their party, the better to diſcover where they haunt and are reſett. As alſo with full power to the ſaid Orbiſtoun, to take and apprehend the perſons of all outed miniſters who ſhall be found within, or reſort to the ſaid ſhires, and ſend them in priſoners to Edinburgh, &c.'

The reader may make his own reflections here, and judge what ſtate the ſhires muſt be in, when they were to be expoſed to the diſcipline of highland reformers. Orbiſton was enjoined indeed to ſee that his men ſhould commit no diſorders; but how theſe could be prevented, when ſuch extenſive powers were given, is hard to conceive.

On the ſaid 8th of December, George Jackſon, Thomas Wood, Alexander Heriot, James Graham, and Thomas Robertſon, together with Patrick Cuningham, John Watt, James Kirkwood, Alexander Vakange, and James Glover, were indicted for the apologetic declaration, becauſe they owned, or refuſed to diſown, the ſaid paper upon oath. The laſt five, together with Alexander Heriot, ſolemnly renounced the ſaid declaration at the bar, and the proceſs againſt them was dropt; but the reſt were next day found guilty, and ordered to be taken that very day to the Gallow-lee, betwixt two and five in the afternoon and there to be hanged.

George Jackſon had been a conſiderable time in priſon; and, upon being aſked if he owned the declaration, ſaid that he owned it as far as it was agreeable to the word of God, but allowed of no murder.

Thomas Wood was taken at the reſcue of Enterkinpath; and being aſked if he adhered to the declaration, anſwered, That he did not underſtand it, the clerk read it ſo faſt; but, ſaid they, the covenants are in it, do you adhere to theſe? He anſwered, I do.

James Graham, taylor in Corſmichael in Galloway, was apprehended by Claverhouſe and a party in the highway; they had nothing to lay to his charge, but, finding a bible in his pocket, they looked upon that as a ſure evidence of diſloyalty. They hurried him from place to place. He was put in the irons at Dumfries, becauſe he would not anſwer their queſtions. He was next brought to Edinburgh, where, upon refuſing to declare his opinion concerning the declaration, he was condemned and executed with the reſt. His teſtimony is in the Cloud of Witneſſes.

Thomas Robertſon was impriſoned at Newcaſtle for refuſing the Engliſh oaths. He made his eſcape, and got to Edinburgh, where he was aprehended laſt month, and brought before the council, where he was ſoon enſnared by their queſtions. From his laſt teſtimony, which is in the Cloud of Witneſſes, it appears, that he had formerly been a hearer of the curates; but, upon being brought to hear one of the preſbyterian miniſters, ſuch impreſſions were made upon him that he never followed them any more. He declared his adherence to the covenant of redemption, the ſcriptures of the Old and New teſtament, the work of reformation, ever glorious in the land, &c. and his averſion to all the defections that had been carried on for ſeveral years, and died with great peace and joy; for though he was, for ſome time, under fearful apprehenſions of death, yet he got over all theſe. I need only obſerve, that none of theſe perſons could have been concerned in the apologetical declaration; and yet, upon that very ſcore of refuſing to diſown it, they were put to death.

Two days after this execution the duke of Gordon's patent for being chancellor was read and recorded. Whether he was then a profeſt papiſt, I know not, but ſoon after he certainly was, and that ſet were now getting in as faſt as conveniently could be done.

On the 16th the advocate was ordered to proſecute Walter earl of Tarras for high treaſon. Sometime after he had been brought in priſoner, he confeſſed, 'that, about the time ſir John Cochran and commiſſary Munro got their commiſſion for the Carolina buſineſs, Mr Bailie of Jerviſwood told him he was going to London, however on his own charges; but that the Carolina affair was only a pretence, the true deſign being to preſs the people of England, who could do nothing but talk, to go more effectually about the buſineſs, and do ſomething.' He likeways confeſſed, 'that Jerviſwood ſettled a correſpondence with him, for giving an account of what ſhould paſs between the country party in England and the Scotſmen there; and that Jerviſwood told him, that the only way for ſecuring the Proteſtant religion, was for the king to ſuffer the parliament to ſit, and the bill of excluſion to paſs; paſs; which the king might be induced to if the parliament took ſharp and briſk meaſures.' He further confeſſed, 'that Mr R. Martin came to Torwoodlee's houſe in May 1683, and brought an unſubſcribed letter to the Lady Tarras, which he knew to be written by Jerviſwood then at London; and that Mr Martin told him that things in England were in great diſorder, and were like to come to a height, and that the country-party were conſidering on methods for ſecuring the Proteſtant religion; and that the late earl of Argyll was to get 10 000 l. ſterling, whereas our Scots people fought 30,000 l. which was to be ſent over to Holland to provide arms; and the ſaid earl was to land with thoſe arms in the Weſt-highlands of Scotland; and that Jerviſwood was to be ſent over with money.' The reſt of his confeſſion related to ſome diſcourſes concerning the methods moſt proper to be taken for the ſupport of the Proteſtant religion; but nothing concerning any deſign upon the perſon of either the king or his brother. The earl's trial was put off till January next, that he might not be under ſentence when brought as a witneſs againſt Jerviſwood, whoſe trial was now drawing near.

On the 18th of December Claverhouſe came with a party to the water of Dee in Galloway, and ſurpriſed ſix of the lurking people at Achincloy, and ordered Robert Ferguſon and James MacMichan from Nithſdale, and Robert Stuart and John Grier from Galloway, to be ſhot inſtantly After they were buried, their graves and coffins were uncovered by a party ſent by Claverhouſe, and continued ſo for four days. James MacMichan's body was taken up and hung upon a tree. Claverhouſe carried the other two, viz Robert Smith in the pariſh of Glencairn, and Robert Hunter, to Kirkcudbright, ſummoned a ſort of jury and hanged them there. There were other two in company with theſe ſix; but they happily eſcaped. However, the ſoldiers being informed of a houſe they had gone into, marched thither, took all they found in it priſoners, and burnt the houſe to the ground.

I am now come to the infamous trial and execution of Mr Bailie of Jerviſwood. It might have been thought, that, when he was fined in the ſum of 6000 l. ſterling, he had received his final ſentence; but he was ſtill kept ſhut up, and denied all attendance or aſſiſtance. 'He ſeemed all the while, ſays biſhop Burnet, ſo compoſed, and even ſo cheerful, that his behaviour looked like the reviving of the ſpirit of the nobleſt of the old Greeks or Romans; or rather, of the primitive chriſtians and firſt martyrs in thoſe beſt days of the church; but the duke was not ſatisfied with all this: ſo the miniſtry applied their arts to Tarras and the other priſoners, threatening them with all the extremities of miſery if they would not witneſs treaſonable matter againſt Bailie. They alſo practiſed on their wives, and, frightening them, ſet them on their huſbands.' The reader has ſeen the confeſſion of Tarras, as far as it relates to this worthy gentleman.

Jerviſwood received his indictment on the 22d of December, and next day petitioned for more time; but no regard was paid to it. He was then in a dying condition, and could not have lived many days. However, he was carried to the bar of juſticiary in his night-gown, attended by his ſiſter, who ſeveral times gave him cordials, and, not being able to ſtand, was obliged to ſit on a ſtool. His indictment bore, in general, his carrying on a correſpondence to debar his royal highneſs, the king's only brother, from the right of ſucceſſion. Though his advocates pled that he ought not to paſs to the knowledge of an aſſize, becauſe he had not got a ſummons in 15 days, and ſo had not time to offer an exculpation or vindication, and that he had already been judged for what was contained in the indictment, yet all pleas were rejected, and he was brought to his trial. The earl of Tarras was admitted an evidence, though he was himſelf under proceſs of high treaſon. His depoſition was much the ſame with his confeſſion. The depoſitions of Alexander Munro of Bearcroſs, James Murray of Philiphaugh, Hugh Scot of Gallowſhiels, are at large in the ſtate-trials. They amounted to this, that Jarviſwood being in hazard, as all the nation was, of oppreſſion, after the unaccountable deciſion in Blackwood's caſe, went up to London, and converſed with ſeveral concerning what was proper for inducing the king to exclude a popiſh ſucceſſor, and about ſending money to Argyll, &c. but no deſign againſt the king's life was known to any of them. Biſhop Burnet ſays, 'they ſwelled up the matter beyond the truth, yet all did not amount to a full proof. So the miniſtry, being afraid that a jury might not be ſo eaſy as they expected, ordered Carſtair's confeſſion to be read in court, not as an evidence (for that had been promiſed him not to be done) but as that which would fully ſatisfy the jury, and diſpoſe them to believe witneſſes:' but, as he had a promiſe that nothing he ſaid ſhould be brought in prejudice to any, directly or indirectly, on his trial, it muſt be left with the reader, whether the reading his confeſſion, to ſupport the evidence againſt Jerviſwood, was not a breach of the conditions given to Mr Carſtairs. Beſides, the title given to Mr Carſtairs's confeſſion, viz. The depoſition of Mr William Carſtairs, when he was examined before the lords of the ſecret committe, given in by him, and renewed upon oath, upon the 22d of December 1684, in preſence of the lords of his majeſty's privy council, ſeems to intimate that he had voluntarily renewed his depoſition the 22d of December, with an eye to Jarviſwood's trial; than which nothing is more injurious to this worthy miniſter. The caſe was this. Mr Carſtairs, being their priſoner, was brought to Edinburgh a few days before Jerviſwood's trial, and was importuned to be a witneſs againſt his friend, which he rejected with abhorrence; and, at the ſame time, put them in mind of the conditions formerly granted him, and of the breach of faith in this propoſal. He was next urged only to appear before the juſticiary at a time when Jerviſwood was not preſent, and judicially own that he had emitted the depoſitions ſigned by his own hand. This he alſo refuſed; but he was never before the council, only, when the chancellor Queensberry, and ſome others, produced the original papers which he had formerly ſigned, he owned them, and, at the ſame time, reminded them of the former conditions. How then it came, that, in the foreſaid title, it ſhould be ſaid, that he renewed his depoſitions in preſence of the lords of his majeſty's privy-council, on the 22d of December, muſt be left with the reader.

The advocate after the witneſſes were examined, and Mr Carſtairs's confeſſion was read, together with the examinations of Mr Shepherd and Mr Zachary Boura, made a moſt virulent ſpeech to the jury (which the reader will find in the ſtate-trials) wherein he aggravated every thing to the higheſt degree, Jerviſwood looking him broad in the face, appeared exceedingly troubled. When Sir George had done he had liberty to ſpeak, and, among other things, ſaid, 'There is one thing which vexes me extremely, and wherein I am injured to the utmoſt degree; and that is, for a plot to cut off the king and his royal highneſs, and that I ſat up nights to form a declaration to palliate or juſtify ſuch a villany. I am, in probability, to appear in ſome hours before the tribunal of the great Judge; and, in preſence of your lordſhips, and all here, I ſolemnly declare, that never was I prompted or privy to any ſuch thing; and that I abhor and deteſt all thoughts and principles for touching the life and blood of his ſacred majeſty or his royal brother. I was ever for monarchial government.' Then looking directly on the advocate, he ſaid, 'My lord, I think it very ſtrange you charge me with ſuch abominable things; you may remember, that, when you came to me in priſon, you told me ſuch things were laid to my charge, but you did not believe them.' How then, my lord, come you to lay ſuch a ſtain upon me with ſo much violence? Are you now convinced in your conſcience that I am more guilty than before? You may remember what paſſed betwixt us in the priſon.' The whole audience fixed their eyes upon the advocate, who was in no ſmall confuſion, and ſaid, 'Jerviſwood, I own what you ſay; my thoughts were then as a private man; but what I ſay here is by ſpecial direction of the privy-council.' And pointing to Sir William Paterſon the clerk, added, 'he knows my orders.' Jerviſwood replied, 'Well, if your lordſhip has one conſcience for yourſelf and another for the council, I pray God forgive you; I do.' Then, turning to the juſtice general, ſaid, My lord, I trouble your lordſhip no farther.'

Next

Next morning, the 24th of December, the jury brought him in guilty; the lords condemned him to be hanged at the market-cross of Edinburgh, between two and four that afternoon, his head to be cut off, and fixed on the Nether-bow port, and his body to be quartered; one of his quarters to be put on the tolbooth of Jedburgh, another on that of Lanerk, and a third on that of Ayr, and the fourth on that of Glasgow, &c. When the sentence was passed, he said, My lords, the time is short, the sentence is sharp; but I thank my God who hath made me as fit to die as ye are to live.

He was then sent back to his apartment in the prison, and, leaning on the bed, he fell into a rapture of joy at the assured prospect of a blessed eternity. And being asked, after a short silence, how he did, he answered, Never better; and in a few hours I shall be well beyond all conception. They are going to send me, in pieces and quarters, through the country. They may hag and hew my body as they please, but I know assuredly nothing shall be lost; but all these my members shall be wonderfully gathered, and made like Christ's glorious body. He was not able to go up the ladder without support. When on it he began to say, My faint zeal for the protestant religion hath brought me to this; but the drums interrupted him. My author was told that his quarters lay three weeks in the thieves hole before they were disposed of according to the sentence.

He prepared a speech to be delivered at the scaffold, but was hindred; however, he left copies of it with his friends. My author has inserted it. He solemnly declared that he was never conscious to any conspiracy against the life of the king or the duke, or to any plot for subverting the government; and that he never had any other intention, in all his public appearances, but the preservation of the protestant religion, the safety of the king's person, the continuation of the ancient government, the redressing of grievances, the relieving the oppressed, and putting a stop to the shedding of blood. In short, it breathes a spirit of true piety; he declared he died a member of the church of Scotland, in its best and purest times under presbytery, and a hater of popish idolatry and superstition. He expressed his fears that popery would be just ready to break in upon us. 'It seems, says he, the generation is fitted for it, and all the engines of hell have been made use of to debauch the consciences of people.——Men are compelled to take contradictory oaths, that they may believe things that have a contradiction in them.' And, after bewailing the sad case of the church of Scotland at that time, he concluded with these words, 'I go with joy to Him who is the joy and bridegroom of my soul, to Him who is the Saviour and Redeemer of my soul. I go with rejoicing to the God of my life, to my portion and inheritance, to the husband of my soul. Come Lord.'

Thus, says the historian of his own times, 'a learned and worthy gentleman, after twenty months hard usage was brought to such a death, in a way so full, in all the steps of it, of the spirit and practice of the courts of inquisition, that one is tempted to think that the methods taken in it were suggested by one well studied, if not practised in them. The only excuse that ever was pretended for this infamous prosecution, was, that they were sure he was guilty, and that the whole secret of the negociation between the two kingdoms was trusted to him; and, since he would not discover it, all methods might be taken to destroy him, not considering what a precedent they made on this occasion.' But I must now go on to other things.

The same day that Jerviswood was executed the lady Cavers was ordered to be released upon paying her fine. This excellent lady had now been in prison above two years for non conformity; and, had it not been for her son who came home this year, she had still continued in confinement. The treatment her tenants met with, during her imprisonment, rendered them incapable of paying her any rent; so that she was deprived of the use of any means for her livelihood or subsistence, though she had a small numerous family. She had represented her case in a humble and moving petition to the council; but they paid no regard to it, till her son, Sir William Douglas of Cavers, presented another petition, praying that she might be suffered to come to her friends and relations; and that they would receive him as a bail for her living regularly, or, within three months after the date of her liberation, depart the kingdom, and not return without special allowance. They gave orders for her being set at liberty, but would not part with her extravagant fine. I need make no reflections on this.

The same day Mr George Scot of Pitlochie was let out of the Bass, upon promise to go to the plantations. The occasion of his being imprisoned there I know not. We shall meet with him again next year. Lady Colvil was the same day allowed a better room in the prison, to which she had been confined for refusing to pay an extravagant fine.

At last, on the 30th of December, the council published a proclamation against the apologetical declaration. The tenor of which is as follows: viz.

CHARLES, &c.

FOrasmuchas several insolent and desperate rebels, having frequently refused the reiterated offers of our clemency, have of late associated themselves, under a pretended form of government, in societies, fellowships, &c. and have, in their meetings, at last pulled off the mask under which they formerly endeavoured to disguise their bloody and execrable principles, and——declared, in a late treasonable paper,——intitled, The Apologetical, &c. that they have disowned us and our authority, and have declared war against us, and from that do infer that it is———a duty to kill and murder all who do any manner of way serve us, or bear charge under us. &c. Therefore we, with the advice, &c. do hereby ordain, that whosoever shall own the said most execrable———declaration, or associations therein mentioned, and the principles therein specified, or whosoever shall refuse to disown the same, in so far as it declares a war against his sacred majesty, and asserts that it is lawful to kill such as serve in church, state, army and country, shall be tried and executed to the death. And farther,———we command all our good subjects ———betouth the river Tay, that they be ready to concur with our magistrates, &c. in seeking, searching, &c. and———do their utmost endeavour to seek——and apprehend any that shall own the said apologetical declaration,———or refuse to disown the same——And since these rebels, after declaring their hellish intentions, for the better performance of their mischievous designs, lurk in secret, and are never discerned but in the acts of their horrid assassinations, and, passing up and down among our loyal subjects, take an opportunity to murder and assassinate.———Therefore, as a remedy for these inconveniences, we declare it to be our royal will and pleasure.——and we hereby command all heritors, &c. and, in their absence, their factors and chamberlains, to convocate all the inhabitants on their lands, and to bring them before any of our privy counsellors, or our commissioners appointed by our council, &c. and the master, and all the inhabitants shall, in solemn manner in presence of the said commissioners, take the following oath, viz. I A. B. do hereby abhor, renounce, and disown in the presence of Almighty God, the pretended declaration of war lately affixed at several parish-churches, in so far as it declares a war against his sacred majesty, and asserts that it is lawful to kill such as serve his majesty, in church, state, army, or country. And such as can subscribe are to subscribe the same; and, on performance thereof, the said commissioners are hereby ordained to deliver to every such person a testificate;———which testificate——is to serve for a free pass to all who have the same,———and shall preserve them from all molestation;———certifying hereby all such as shall adventure to travel without a testificate, ——that they shall be holden and used as commuers with the said execrable rebels, &c. —— And if any heritor &c. shall fail in doing as aforesaid, they shall be holden as guilty of the foresaid crimes, and pursued and punished accordingly. And we do hereby strictly prohibit and discharge all our leiges, whether in burgh or land, as well as other house-keepers as hostler-houses, inn keepers inn keepers and other houſes of common reſet, to harbour, lodge, or entertain any perſon whatſoever unleſs they have ſuch certificates,———under the pain of being puniſhed as reſetters of and intercommuners with rebels. And, for farther ſecurity, and prevention of fraud, it is hereby required that the uſers and havers of the foreſaid teſtificates ſhall be holden and obliged to ſwear that theſe certificates are true and unforged teſtificates, and that they are the perſons mentioned and expreſſed in them, if the ſame ſhall be required of them. And, finally, for the encouragement of ſuch as ſhall diſcover any of the ſaid traitors and aſſaſſins, or any who have been any wiſe in acceſſion to the ſaid traiterous and damnable paper, or to the publiſhing or ſpreading of the ſame, as ſaid is, or to have been a member of the ſaid pretended ſocieties or fellowſhips, &c. we hereby declare and aſſure to them, or any of them———a reward of the ſum of five hundred merks Scots for each of them who ſhall be diſcovered, ſo as to be apprehended and found guilty.'

The narrative of this monſtruous proclamation is full of abominable lies and horrid miſrepreſentations: for here, with the utmoſt virulence, they charge theſe people with maintaining the principles of aſſaſſination; whereas, in the very declaration itſelf, they declare their abhorrence and deteſtation of ſuch things. They repreſent them as having aſſociated themſelves under a pretended form of government, which was abſolutely falſe; and my author ſays, that he was apt to believe, that ſome of the managers knew other things, though they ſpoke thus. They repreſent them as having refuſed reiterated offers of clemency; whereas it is well known that they never had any offers of clemency made them, but upon the condition of wilful perjury. As for their declaring againſt the king, was there not a cauſe, as has been already obſerved? The war mentioned was, as themſelves explain it, not a declared inſurrection with hoſtile force to break the peace of the nation, (that had been done by the introduction of abjured prelacy, and the perſecution that neceſſarily followed upon it) but an avowed and conſtant oppoſition to the murdering violence, injuſtice and oppreſſion of the faction then in power. Let any of us imagine ourſelves in their circumſtances, hunted as patridges on the mountains, killed all the day long, and ſuppoſe in ſuch a ſituation, we ſhould emit a declaration, warning our bloody perſecutors either to deſiſt from their perſecution, or to expect that, as far as we are able, we will prevent the ſhedding of our own blood, by bringing them to puniſhment, let the reader judge whether he could be condemned; and this was the caſe with theſe people, and the ſtate of all the war they declared, and, when we farther conſider that none could diſown the declaration without approving the cruelties exerciſed on the declarers, it is not to be wondered that many flood out. Beſides they looked upon the oath of abjuration, impoſed by this wicked proclamation, in every reſpect unlawful, becauſe the declaration required to be abjured aſſerts no ſuch things as is repreſented; and therefore to ſwear to abhor, renounce and diſown it, in ſo far as it declares it lawful to kill all who ſerve the king in church, ſtate, army or country, when no ſuch thing is aſſerted, muſt needs be to ſwear a falſhood. They who took this oath thereby incorporated themſelves with the bloody impoſers of it, condemned the ſufferers, and juſtified the cruel perſecution that was carried on againſt them, as if they were murderers and aſſaſſins; whereas, in the declaration, they were ſo far from owning it lawful to kill all employed in the king's ſervice, in church, ſtate, army or country, that they teſtified to the world that they propoſed not to injure or offend any whatſoever, but ſuch as were directly acceſſory to the murder of their brethren; nay, they expreſly diſtinguiſhed from others the notorious villains among them, men of death and blood, who had actually ſhed their blood, and gloried in it; and theſe they farther divided into ſeveral claſſes according to the reſpective aggravations of their wickedneſs. In the firſt they placed the cruel and bloody of thoſe that murdered by command. In the ſecond they threatened ſuch as were actually in arms againſt them and not all theſe either, but ſuch as cruelly performed that ſervice to the effuſion of their blood. Neither did they threaten all equally, nor any of them peremptorily, but only if they perſiſted maliciouſly to proceed againſt them after the publiſhing of their declaration. In a word, they expreſly declared their abhorrence of all perſonal attempts whatſoever, and prohibited the execution of any part of what they threatened, without previous deliberation, common or competent conſent, &c. All which being conſidered, the queſtion will be how far they aſſerted it lawful to kill all who ſerved the king in church, &c. If no ſuch thing is aſſerted, why ſuch a clauſe in the oath? I ſhall only add, that, if theſe people were ſuch aſſaſſins, why would you make their deſign of aſſaſſination public? for, if I miſtake not, aſſaſſins do not give warning of their intentions, but keep their deſigns ſecret till they find an opoprtunity to put them in execution. I ſhall ſay no more upon this point, but refer the reader to the Hind let looſe, from p. 537, to p. 557. Though theſe people in their declaration, abhorred aſſaſſination, as all good men ſhould and certainly will, yet this proclamation made way for many aſſinations and murders, as ſhall be related; for here all muſt not only take the oath of abjuration, but have a certificate of their having done ſo; nay, they muſt ſwear that their certificate is genuine whenever called to it, though by an hoſtler or ſtabler. But to proceed,

The ſame day the above proclamation was publiſhed the council gave a commiſſion to ſeveral noblemen, gentlemen, and others, for holding courts in the ſouthern and weſtern ſhires; and theſe may juſtly be called courts of inquiſition, as is evident from the inſtructions given to the commiſſioners who were thereby impowered and required to examine all in every pariſh, upon oath, with reſpect to the queſtions contained in their commiſſion, and ſecure thoſe who refuſed to anſwer, and to give paſſes and certificates to ſuch as diſowned the horrid principles, thoſe viz. contained in the declaration. But if any owned their principles, or refuſed to diſown them, they were immediately to be judged, and being found guilty, to be preſently hanged on the place: 'but, ſays the inſtructions, at this time you are not to examine any woman but ſuch as have been active in the ſaid courſes in a ſignal manner, and thoſe are to be drowned.' I ſhall not trouble the reader with the reſt of the inſtructions: from theſe he may eaſily form a judgment concerning them. Upon the whole, it is evident, there was now no peace to him that went out, nor to him that came in, without conforming to the times, of which the following is a ſufficient inſtance.

On the laſt of December a poor man, in the pariſh of St. Mungo, was taken out of his bed, by captain Daziel, for not hearing the curate; and upon his refuſing the teſt, was impriſoned at Dumfries, and threatened with death. He broke priſon and fled to England. His wife and ſeven ſmall children begged their way after him, but, the perſecution being hot there, ſhe was forced to return. While ſitting peaceably in an ale houſe, Weſtcraw and other perſecutors came in and required her to take the teſt, and, upon her refuſing, committed her to priſon at Dumfries, and though ſhe only begged they would allow her to take her ſucking child along with her, (an infant of a quarter old) yea that was rejected; nay, they deſired her to prepare for death, unleſs ſhe complied by next day, when they threatened to drown her. Next morning being aſked if ſhe would ſwear, ſhe ſaid ſhe would not. Being further aſked if ſhe approved of murder, ſhe anſwered, She did not; it was not their fort who were murderers. However they were reſtrained from putting her to death; but ſhe continued five weeks in priſon at Dumfries. Providence took care both of the ſucking infant and of the ſix other children, though they were baniſhed the town. In ſhort, the mother was at laſt ſent priſoner to Edinburgh, whither her children followed her; and the council, for once, put on ſo much good nature as to releaſe her. I ſhall conclude this year with ſome particulars of which I have not the dates.

This year Mr Adam Blackadder, ſon to Mr John Blackadder, and his wife, a young gentlewoman whom he had married in Sweden, were brought to trouble. Before this, when he was about 17 years of ager he endured a five weeks impriſonment at Stirling, becauſe his maſter was alledged to have been at conventicles. He was afterwards impriſoned at Blackneſs for waiting on his father.

John Linning dyer in Glaſgow, though blind, was this year impriſoned fourteen weeks, as he had frequently been before, for nothing but non conformity. When a child of his came to be on her death bed, and paſſionately cried out for her father, ſuch was the unrelenting cruelty of the magiſtrates, they would neither ſuffer him to attend her when dying, nor her funeral when dead. John Carſan of Balmaghan was impriſoned, for refuſing the bond of regularity, for nine months, during part of the laſt year and this, and fined in 6000 merks. His lady was impriſoned by colonel Douglas, and for refuſing the abjuration, received an indictment, and it was given out that they intended to ſentence her to be drowned within the ſea-mark at the ferry of Kirkcudbright; but the king's death put a ſtop to this and ſome other proceſſes of the ſame nature.

Several other inſtances of the ſeverity of this year might be mentioned, as the ſcourging a poor old woman of 73 years of age, the great hardſhips of lady Gilleſpie, by the depredations of ſoldiers, and being forced to leave her country and flee to Ireland, &c. and the hardſhips endured by Charles Stuart of Knock; but theſe I paſs over.

The ſcene of cruelty, oppreſſion and blood continued thro' the whole of the year 1685. The powers granted to the ſoldiers, and the abjuration-courts produced dreadful effects. Multitudes were cut off every month without the tedious formality of a proceſs. Hanging, heading, drowning, torturing, and many other pieces of cruelty were uſed. Before I come to relate things in the order of time, I ſhall give ſome inſtances of ſeverity in preſſing the abjuration oath.

In the pariſh of Nithſdale, James Croſbie, for refuſing the abjuration, had his ears cropt, and was ſold for a ſlave to Jamaica. The cropping of ears is a new puniſhment. We ſhall have more inſtances of this by and by. The abjuration was violently preſſed upon all ranks, ſexes and ages, by the commiſſioned courts of Dalry and other parts in Galloway, and through the large ſhire of Ayr.

One William Johnſtoun, of the pariſh of Auchinleck, was ſummoned to one of theſe courts, and, not appearing, a party of ſoldiers was ſent to his houſe, who plundered it; and, as he and his wife had retired, took away with them the maid who was left to take care of the children, leaving the deſtitute infants by themſelves, and, becauſe ſhe refuſed the oath, which ſhe had told them ſhe did not underſtand; they put fiery matches between her fingers, and burnt the fleſh to the bone. Her patience and compoſure ſo aſtoniſhed her tormenters, that they thought proper to diſmiſs her.

The ſhire of Lanerk was grievouſly haraſſed by the ſoldiers and theſe abjuration courts. Women were carried from priſon to priſon, families were diſperſed, ſeveral were baniſhed, as J. Harvey, Walter Ker and Andrew MacKillen in the pariſh of Dalſerf. One John Stuart, in the ſame pariſh, had his wife carried priſoner to Hamilton, with a child not a month old, where ſhe fell ſo ill with travelling ſo far in her condition, that ſhe was left for dead, becauſe ſhe did not appear, and refuſed the oath. Some were killed on the ſpot, as a poor man in the pariſh of Twinham, who was ſhot by order of Captain Douglaſs, becauſe he would not anſwer their queſtions. Some were ſent to the plantations, others to Dunnotter, and not a few continued in priſon till the toleration granted two years after this. The pariſh of Tongland was greatly oppreſſed by lieutenant Livingſtone; for, after the courts had been held there for preſſing the oath, ſearches were made for the recuſants, and one John Hallome, a youth of 18 years of age, was ſeized on the road, carried from place to place, and at laſt to Kirkcudbright, where, upon refuſing the abjuration, a jury of ſoldiers was called, and the young man preſently executed. Every perſon who endeavoured to ſhun theſe parties was looked upon as guilty, and immediately diſpatched. William Auchinleck, in the pariſh of Buttle, happened to fall in with a company of Douglaſs's foot, who ordered him to ſtand. The man complied with every thing; but not caring to loſe his horſe, which he ſuſpected the ſoldiers had a mind for, he rode as faſt as he could from them; and, fetching a compaſs, got to a public houſe called Carlinwark, where he took a refreſhment on horſeback, thinking he was out of their reach. Mean while ſome of them came up and ſhot him.

The conformable clergy were not wanting at this time to promote theſe cruelties. Thus one Finnie curate of Cathcart, informed againſt John Watſon, a beggar in that pariſh, as a dangerous perſon, becauſe he would not hear him, nor take the abjuration-oath, and got him apprehended by a party of lord Roſs's troop. When they found him in his cottage, and ſaw he was neither able to flee from them, nor travel with them, being a poor cripple, they curſed Finnie, who had hounded them out after ſuch a prey. They urged him hard to take the abjuration. John told them that it was now long ſince he ſwore the Covenant, and was reſolved to ſwear no more oaths. In ſhort, lord Roſs, getting notice of this affair, bleſſed for the curate, ſent the poor man half a crown, and ordered him to be diſmiſſed.

While the ſoldiers were almoſt every week murdering in the fields, the commiſſioners above mentioned, or any two of them, had the power of life and death in their hands, and even exceeded their inſtructions; and it is remarkable, that all theſe methods of barbarity were ſo far from leſſening the number of the ſufferers, that the more they were perſecuted, the more they increaſed; but I ſhall now relate things more diſtinctly in the order of time when they happened.

On the ſecond of January, Andrew MacGill, ſon to John MacGill in the pariſh of Ballentrae in Ayr-ſhire, having been apprehended on the laſt of December, was executed at Ayr, and ſoon after his father's houſe was plundered by colonel Douglaſs. I ſhall only obſerve that the old man and his other ſon ſuffered greatly.

On the 5th the proceſs againſt the earl of Tarras came on before the juſticiary. It was delayed till now, that he might be an evidence againſt Jerviſwood. He was this day indicted upon the grounds mentioned in his confeſſion. Next day the jury brought him in guilty of treaſon, and the lords condemned him to be executed as a traitor; however he afterwards got his life, and was allowed by the council to go to the country for his health, upon a bond to appear when called.

On the 7th a letter came from the king, ordering thoſe gentlemen mentioned p. 283, except Jerviſwood, who was executed, to be proſecuted before the enſuing parliament, which was appointed to ſit down on the 10th of March next.

Next day the council wrote to the biſhop of Moray, ſignifying that they had granted a commiſſion to the earls of Errol and Kintore, and Sir George Munro of Culrain, to proſecute all perſons guilty of church diſorders, between Spey and Neſs, including Strathſpey and Inverneſs, and recommending to him to enjoin all the miniſters in theſe bounds to attend on the ſaid commiſſioners on the 22d of January next, along with their elders, and liſts of perſons guilty of theſe diſorders, or ſuſpected of being diſaffected to the preſent eſtabliſhed government in church and ſtate. Lord Duffus, with the militia troops, was ordered to attend them; for nothing could be done without military apoſtles. On the 9th of January their commiſſion was extended to Inverneſs, Roſs, Cromarty and Sutherland; for the baniſhed miniſters, and others, after the firſt introduction of prelacy, and thoſe of late who were baniſhed by the high commiſſion, together with the labours of Meſſ. MacGilligen, Hog, and others, were ſo ſucceſsful, that not a few in theſe northern parts, were enemies to prelacy; but theſe muſt now be perſecuted. We ſhall relate ſome of the conſequences of this commiſſion when they give in their report to the council.

On the ſame 9th of January the magiſtrates of Edinburgh, in proſecution of an act of council, iſſued a proclamation, requiring all heritors, liferenters, factors, &c. to give in, upon oath, exact liſts of all the inhabitants of the city; and particularly maſters and miſtreſſes of families were hereby enjoined to give in liſts of all their children above 16 years of age, and of all who had lodged with them ſince the beginning of laſt November. This was

was hard upon the keepers of public houſes, who might perhaps have different lodgers every night; but the deſign of this was to prevent the ſufferers from having any ſhelter; and it is not unlikely that the ſame method was uſed in other conſiderable towns: how far this was an encroachment on the liberty of the ſubject muſt be left with the reader. But what by the garriſons, and what by the ſtrict ſearches that were made, it is but too evident that the managers relied little upon that.

It was at one of theſe ſearches that Thomas Jackſon, in the pariſh of Eaſtwood, who had returned from baniſhment, was taken in Glaſgow by major Balfour and colonel Buchan. Making ſome reſiſtance he was dreadfully wounded in the head, and immediately carried to the green and ordered to be ſhot; but that no ways moving him, and the perſecutors changing their reſolution, he was ſent to priſon, and from that to the thieves-hole at Edinburgh, where he was 32 weeks loaded with irons. He was at laſt baniſhed to New Jerſey, but died in the paſſage.

On the 11th Mr Alexander Shiels was apprehended in London, with ſeveral others, at a private meeting in Gutter-lane, by the city-marſhal, who came upon them unawares, and commanded them to ſurrender in the king's name. Mr Shields being the firſt in his way, replied, What king do ye mean? By whoſe authority do you diſturb the peaceable ordinances of Chriſt? Sir, you diſhonour your king in making him an enemy to the worſhip of God. At which the marſhal ſaid, he had other buſineſs than to ſtand prating with him. Mr Shields made an attempt to eſcape, but was not able to do it; ſo that he and his companions were brought before the lord mayor, who threatened to ſend him to Bridewell for not giving him a diſtinct account who he was. However, bail was offered and admitted for him to anſwer at Guild hall on the 14th. It was with difficulty he was prevailed with to give in bail.

On the 14th he attended with a firm reſolution to anſwer, but while he went out for a refreſhment he was called, and, none anſwering for him, his bail-bond was forfeited. This gave him no ſmall uneaſineſs. However, to prevent his bail coming to any harm, he appeared at Guildhall on the 20th, when he was arraigned in common form, and then examined whether he was at Bothwell, or approved of Sharp's death, or thought it was murder. To which he replied, That he was not obliged to give an account of his thoughts; and that he came there to anſwer to his indictment, and not to ſuch queſtions as theſe. Upon which he was taken to Newgate, without any mittimus, or any expreſs orders from the court what priſon he ſhould be committed to. He tried in vain to make his eſcape. It was ſome days before his mittimus came, by which he was ordered to be kept in cuſtody till the next quarter-ſeſſions, which was to be at Guildhall on the 23d of February next. But to return to Scotland.

On the 17th of January the council ordered the advocate to purſue the pariſhioners of Anworth for affronts done to their miniſter, and the pariſh of Carſphairn for the murder of their miniſter by ſome ſkulking rebels.

Mr Peter Peirſon curate of Carſphairn was a violent inſtigator of the perſecution, and an open favourer of Popery. About the end of the laſt year ſome of the wanderers entered into a combination to concert meaſures to force him to give a declaration, under his hand, obliging himſelf to deſiſt from his violent courſes, and from exciting their enemies againſt them, but without any deſign to injure his perſon. Accordingly James MacMichael, fowler to the laird of Maxweltoun, Rodger Padzen, Robert Mitchel, William Herron, and, according to other accounts, one Watſon, and ſome more, having notice that Peirſon was at home, came to the manſion houſe, and ſent thoſe above mentioned to deſire him to ſpeak with ſome who were to do him no harm. Two of them, it ſeems, got in and delivered the meſſage, which ſo enraged him, that he drew a broad ſword, cocked a gun or piſtol, and got between them and the door; upon which they called out, and MacMichael and Padzen came and knocked at the door. Peirſon opened it, and, going to attack them with arms, MacMichael ſhot him dead on the ſpot. The reſt, at ſome diſtance, hearing a noiſe, ran up and cried, Take no lives; but it was too late. Therefore from a deteſtation of this fact, they ſeparated themſelves from thoſe mentioned. And ſo far were the publiſhers of the apologetical declaration from countenancing any thing that had the appearance of aſſaſſination, that they diſcharged all the above mentioned perſons from their ſocieties, and would never be ſeen in their company; and it was likeways the abhorrence of all the reſt of the Preſbyterians. Mitchel, Herron and MacMichael were all of them killed one way or another this year. Watſon was one of the governments ſpies, and Padzen was admitted after this to ſerve the king in Strachan's troop of dragoons; ſo that ſome were of opinion that the hand of Joab was in this matter; but this I muſt leave with the reader.

On the 19th Robert Millar maſon in Rutherglen, and Robert Pollock, called in the regiſters ſhoe maker in Glaſgow, but, by other accounts, in the pariſh of Kilbryde, were ſentenced by the juſticiary, merely for not diſowning the declaration, to be hanged on the 23d. They both ſuffered accordingly at the Gallow lee, between 8 and 9 in the morning. Their laſt teſtimonies are in the Cloud of Witneſſes; from which it appears that they had ſublime thoughts of Chriſt, counting all things but loſs and dung in compariſon of him; that they were noways afraid of dying for his ſake, and that they were full of that comfort and joy which no ſtranger can intermeddle with.

The ſame day they were executed, James Don, Robert Don, Alexander MacAulay, Thomas Stevenſon, John MacClaud, and John Stevenſon, being at prayer in the Caldunes, in the pariſh of Monigaff in Galloway, were ſurpriſed by colonel James Douglas, lieutenant Livingſtone, and coronet Douglas, with a party of horſe, and, without any proceſs were ſhot to death.

On the 26th Sir Patrick Hume of Polwart, George Pringle of Torwoodlee, and Mr Fletcher of Saltoun were proſecuted before the juſticiary, and, not appearing, were forfeited; and, on the 28th, the council gave orders to ſecure their lands and effects for the king's uſe. The appearances of theſe gentlemen againſt a popiſh ſucceſſor was all their crime. Polwart ſurvived this black period, and was made earl of Marchmont after the revolution, and had the honour of being an active inſtrument in ſecuring the proteſtant religion from the deſigns of the adherents to a popiſh pretender. Mr Fletcher of Saltoun was likeways juſtly eſteemed a brave patriot for the religion and liberties of his country, and a gentleman of a polite taſte and great learning.

Mr Pringle of Torwoodlee, notwithſtanding all his ſervice to the king againſt Cromwell, underwent a ſeries of troubles in this period, eſpecially after the eſcape of Argyll, when he was obliged to keep himſelf as retired as poſſible. Laſt ſummer he was fined in 2000 l. ſterling. When the pretended plot was trumped up, Mr Pringle was ſought for as concerned in it; but, by means of information from Meldrum, he eſcaped. Eight days after his eſcape a party came to his houſe, and ſeized his ſon, a youth of about 16 years of age, and carried him to priſon at Edinburgh, where he was confined for above three months, though no crime was laid to his charge. At length, the priſon being crouded, he was admitted to bail for 500 l. ſterling, tho' ſtill confined to the liberties of Edinburgh. Two months after this he was ordered to attend the ſecret committee, where the duke of Queenſberry, the lord high treaſurer, threatened him with having every bone of his body broken, every joint diſjointed, his fleſh ripped up, and boling oil and lead poured into him, if he did not acquaint them who informed his father of the party's coming, and the executioner was accordingly brought: but upon ſecond thoughts, his puniſhment was turned to a three or four weeks cloſe impriſonment in the caſtle of Edinburgh. When that was expired he was again admitted to bail as above. Mean while his father was forfeited, and his mother denied the liferent that was due to her by her contract of marriage. After the miſcarriage of Argyll's attempt, Torwoodlee eſcaped again to Holland; and his ſon, notwithſtanding his bail, was ſearched after a ſecond time; but he ſurrendered himſelf, and was confined to the caſtle of Blackneſs for other three months, and was barbarouſly uſed by Livingſtone of Badlormie the governor. In ſhort, the whole of this family was now involved in trouble by thoſe cruel oppreſſors; but his lady's courage and piety, her ſerenity and evenneſs of temper, under all theſe hardſhips, were very remarkable. This worthy gentleman died in July 1689, and his lady ſurvived him a year and ſome months. He ſerved his country in the convention of eſtates called by the great prince of Orange, and, with his collegue Sir William Scot of Harden younger, voted the offer of the crown to his highneſs and his excellent princeſs. But to return.

On the 30th John Dalziel of Kirkmichael, and lieutenant Straiton, with a party of fifty ſoldiers, ſurpriſed ſome of the hiding people aſleep in the pariſh of Mortoun in Nithſdale. They all eſcaped except Daniel MacMichael, who, being under bodily indiſpoſition, was unable to flee. The ſoldiers wounded him, and carried him that night to the pariſh of Duriſdeer. After many queſtions, which he declined to anſwer, he was told, that, unleſs he owned the government in church and ſtate, and ſwore the oath they were to tender to him, the law made him liable to death. Daniel ſaid to the captain, 'Sir, that is what of all things I cannot do; but very cheerfully I ſubmit to the Lord's diſpoſal as to my life.' The commander ſaid, 'Do you not know your life is in my hand?' Daniel replied, 'No, Sir, I know my life is in the Lord's hand, and, if he ſee good, he can make you the inſtrument to take it away.' Then he was ordered to prepare for death next day; to which he anſwered, 'If my life muſt go for his cauſe, I am willing, my God will prepare me.' His joy and conſolation were ſuch that night, that impreſſions were made on ſome of the ſoldiers, who deſired to die his death. Next day he was brought to the fields at Dalveen, in the pariſh of Duriſdeer. He had liberty to pray, a favour refuſed to many ſufferers in this period. He prayed to the admiration of all that heard him, ſung part of Pſalm xiii. read John xvi. and ſpoke with much gravity and ſolidity to Captain Dalziel. When the napkin was put over his face, he ſaid, 'Lord, thou brought Daniel into many ſtraits, and haſt brought me thy ſervant hither to witneſs for thee and thy cauſe; into thy hands I commit my ſpirit, and hope to praiſe thee through all eternity.' Then, upon his giving them a ſignal, he was ſhot by four who were appointed for the purpoſe. His carriage ſtruck a terror on the ſoldiers who obeyed the bloody orders; but a little money, and ſome more ravages, ſtifled their convictions. He lies buried in Duriſdeer church-yard.

Some time in January Captain Bruce came with a party to the houſe of Thomas MacHaffie, in the pariſh of Straiton in Carrick; and tho' the good man was ill of a fever, yet, becauſe he declined their queſtions, and refuſed the abjuration, they took him out and ſhot him directly.

The month of February, I am now entering upon, was very bloody. We have but a few inſtances of the proceedings of the commiſſioned courts for preſſing the abjuration. On the firſt of this month John Park and James Algie in Eaſtwood were apprehended, and on the third brought before the lord Roſs, the laird of Orbiſtoun, and others, the commiſſioners for the ſhire of Renfrew, by whom they were condemned, and ordered for execution that ſame day. And though they were prevailed with to conſent to take the oath of abjuration, yet Orbiſtoun told them. The abjuration-oath ſhall not ſave you; unleſs you take the teſt you ſhall hang preſently To which the two young men anſwered, If, to ſave our lives, we muſt take the teſt, and the abjuration will not ſave us, we will take no oaths at all. Upon this they were ſentenced to die preſently, and were accordingly executed at Paiſley, where they ly buried. The ſaid Orbiſtoun, after ſentence was paſſed, gloried in his wickedneſs, and ſaid to ſome of his attendants, They thought to have cheated the judges, but, by——, I have tricked them. And ſuch was the madneſs of the ſoldiers, that they endeavoured to force thoſe who were at their burial to declare that they died juſtly, and threatened them with preſent impriſonment if they did not. A piece of barbarity peculiar to this period!

While thoſe two youths were hanging, Robert King miller at Pollock ſhaws, in the ſame pariſh of Eaſtwood was before this commiſſion-court. He declined anſwering their queſtions. At laſt the teſt was put to him which he refuſed. Upon which they bid him look upon theſe two who were hanging before the window, and aſſured him, that, if he took not the teſt, he ſhould be immediately tied up with them. To terrify him into a compliance, he was ſhut up in a corner of the priſon, and aſſured that he had but an hour to live; that they would give him three warnings by ſound of trumpet, and if he ſat the third there was no mercy for him. Robert ſat the two firſt ſounds, but his courage failing him he took the teſt: however, ſays my author, it pleaſed God to give him repentance not to be repented of, and he lived till a good old age His wife Janet Scoular bore all the loſſes her huſband ſuſtained, in this period, with uncommon firmneſs and patience.

On the 5th of February the council releaſed ſome priſoners who had taken the teſt, and others, not under ſentence of baniſhment, who would take the oath of allegiance. They referred the caſe of John Moſman of Caldermuir to the juſticiary, becauſe of a ſeditious letter found with him, and of his not abjuring the late declaration. They likeways ordered Quintin Dick, Robert Sloſe, Duncan Ferguſon, Mr William Wilhart, Mr George Room, and ſeveral others, to be ſent to the plantations; but the king's death, happening at this time, altered their meaſures with reſpect to ſundry of theſe perſons.

For, on the 6th of February King Charles II. died. There were, ſays biſhop Burnet, very many apparent ſuſpicions of his being poiſoned, and ſeveral looked upon his brother as privy to it. But not to enter upon that point, I ſhall only obſerve, that before he died care was taken to adminiſter to him the three popiſh ſacraments of penance, extreme unction, and the euchariſt; which he received by the hands of father Huddleſtone a Benedictine monk. As for the character of this prince, of which a great deal is ſaid by the hiſtorians of his reign, I ſhall only ſay that if he was poſſeſſed of any good qualities, his diſſimulation and hypocriſy, his horrid perjury, his wickedneſs and profaneneſs, threw a gloomy and black vail over them. Some have cried him up for a prince of a merciful diſpoſition; but, if any regard is to be paid to the biſhop of Saliſbury's judgment, we muſt have other thoughts of him. His words are theſe, 'He had the appearance of gentleneſs in his outward deportment; but he ſeemed to have no bowels nor tenderneſs in his nature; and in the end of his life he became cruel.' In ſhort, the beſt way to judge of his character, is to conſider the hiſtory of his reign.

CHAP. XII.

Of the acceſſion of King James VII. the proceedings of the council and juſticiary; the murders in the weſt: the unſucceſsful attempt of the Earl of Argyll: the ſufferings of the priſoners ſent to Dunnotar, the actings of the parliament; the drowning of two women, and other branches of oppreſſion to the end of the ſeſſion.

THE duke of York, a few hours after his brother's death, was proclaimed king in London, by the name of James II. Biſhop Burnet ſays, It was a heavy ſolemnity; few tears were ſhed for the former, nor were there any ſhouts of joy for the preſent king A dead ſilence, though without any diſorder, followed it through the ſtreets.

When the counſellors returned, the new king, in his ſpeech, promiſed to follow his brother's example, eſpecially in that of his great clemency and tenderneſs to his people, and to preſerve the government both in church and ſtate, as by law eſtabliſhed; and, as he would never depart from the juſt rights and prerogatives of the crown, ſo he would never invade any man's property. Theſe were fine promiſes; but it was well known they were only made to be broken, though he renewed them to the parliament. As to his going publickly to maſs, his continuing the duties and cuſtoms before they were granted by parliament, his publiſhing that the late king died a Papiſt, &c. I muſt refer to the Engliſh hiſtorians.

Though

Though James was a profeſſed papiſt, yet care was taken in England that he ſhould take the Engliſh coronation-oath, but with what alterations I cannot determine. Unfair dealing was ſuſpected; and my author tells us, that the Lord chief baron Aitkins, upon no leſs occaſion than his adminiſtering the oaths to Sir William Aſhurſt lord mayor of London, 1693, publickly aſſerted, That, as alterations were made by biſhop Laud, in ſtriking out thoſe words, which were a part of the old Engliſh coronation-oath, that the king ſhould conſent to ſuch laws as the people ſhould chuſe, when he crowned king Charles I. ſo at the coronation of the late king James II. there was much more ſtruck out of the coronation-oath, which might be well worthy inquiring how it came about.' Echard ſays, this was an aſperſion caſt upon Sancroft by the lord chief baron; but the reader is to judge whether it is probable the chief baron would have expreſſed himſelf in ſuch a manner, upon ſo public an occaſion, if he had not had ſufficient grounds for what he ſaid.

But the king never took the Scots coronation oath. This, abſtracting from his religion, made many call his right to govern in queſtion, and made his forfeiture quite eaſy to the convention of ſtates in Scotland, April 11th 1689. ſo that they very juſtly declared as follows: Whereas king James VII. being a profeſſed Papiſt, did aſſume the regal power, and acted as king, without ever taking the oath required by law, whereby every king at his acceſs to the government, is obliged to ſwear to maintain the proteſtant religion, and to rule the people according to the laudable laws, &c. that by all this he hath forfeited the right to the crown, &c.' Here then king James is declared, by the kingdom of Scotland, to have been an uſurper from the beginning; and if he had no right to the crown of that kingdom, whence his pretended abjured race derive theirs muſt be left with the reader. From this I judge it very plain, that, upon the demiſe of the late king, the crown, by the laws of the land, devolved on the next proteſtant heir, and conſequently the happy revolution reſtored the kingdom of Scotland to its own conſtitution, and bleſſed it with its own rightful governors: ſo that nothing but infatuation can make any perſon, much more any proteſtant, to be fond of the pretender. But to proceed to the hiſtory of this deteſtable reign, as far as it concerns my deſign.

On the 10th of February the king was proclaimed at Edinburgh. The proclamation was ſent down from London; and as it is ſomewhat ſingular, I ſhall here inſert the ſubſtance of it, as follows. 'Foraſmuch as it hath pleaſed the Almighty God to call Charles II. our late ſovereign lord, of Glorious and ever bleſſed memory, from a temporary crown to inherit an eternal in the heavens, whereby the undoubted right of ſucceſſion to him, in the imperial crown of his realm, was immediately devolved on the ſacred perſon of his royal and deareſt brother, our preſent ſacred ſovereign, (whom God long preſerve.) Therefore we, the lords of his majeſty's privy council——— do, with the concurrence of ſeveral others, lords ſpiritual and temporal, barons, and burgeſſes of this realm, hereby declare and proclaim to all the world, that our ſovereign lord James VII. is, by lawful and undoubted ſucceſſion and deſcent, king of Scotland, England, France, &c defender of the faith, &c.———and whom we ſhall humbly obey, dutifully and faithfully ſerve, maintain, and defend, with our lives and fortunes, againſt all deadly, as our only righteous king and ſovereign, over all perſons and in all cauſes, as holding his imperial crown from God alone. And, for teſtification whereof, we here, in preſence of the Almighty God, and a great number of his majeſty's faithful people,——declare and publiſh, that, our ſaid ſovereign lord, by the goodneſs and providence of Almighty God, is of Scotland, England, France, &c. the moſt potent, mighty and undoubted king. And hereby give our oaths, with uplifted hands, that we ſhall bear true and faithful allegiance unto our ſaid ſacred ſovereign JAMES VII. king of Great Britain, France and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. and to his lawful heirs and ſucceſſors; and ſhall perform all duties, ſervice and obedience to him, as becomes his faithful, loyal and dutiful ſubjects. So help us GOD.'

This ſeems to look more like the form of an oath than a proclamation. Here abſolute ſupremacy, indefeaſible and hereditary right are aſſerted in ſtrong terms; but I leave the reader to make his own obſervations on this. It is not worth while to take notice of the fulſom addreſſes on this occaſion, theſe being things of courſe. The new king continued all the civil and military officers for ſome time, and conſequently the ſtate of the ſufferers was ſtill the ſame.

The council proceeded as uſual, many gentlemen, miniſters, and others, were before them; ſome obtained their liberty who had been impriſoned, and fined to the value of their eſtates, for refuſing the teſt. Others were releaſed on condition of returning to their confinement after a limited time, and others upon condition of appearing when called. I ſhall only mention their names, as James Hamilton of Aikenhead, Mr Andrew Kennedy of Clowburn, Andrew Hay of Craignethan, Napier Laird of Kilmahew, William Fairlie of Brunsfield, Sir John Maxwell of Nether-pollock, John Porterfield of Douchal, and Alexander his ſon, Bannantyne of Craigmuir, G. Hamilton of Browncaſtle, Laird of Fairlie, J Crawford of Crawfordland, W. Cuninghame of Aſhenyards, J Whiteford of Balquhan, J. Hamilton younger of Halcraig, the Laird of Craigends younger, J. Caldwell of Caldwell, J. Stuart of Hartwood, William Hamilton of Overtoun, Muirhead of Bradiſholm, Mr John Bannantyne of Corehouſe, Mr William Wiſhart, Mr John Knox, Robert Hamilton of Monkland, John MacGhie of Balpcon, Mr William MacJore, Mr Michael Potter, Mr J. MacGilligen, Hugh Kennedy of Daljarroch, Alexander Hume of Newton, Hugh Montgomery of Boreland, John Mitchel ſon to Tannerhill, Alexander Durham of Duntrieve, Mr George Meldrum of Combrie, Patrick Hay of Naughton, Robert Boyd of Trochridge, C. Alexander in Paiſley, George Douglas of Bonjedburgh, Patrick ſon to Sir Patrick Hume of Polwart, Mr James Futhy, and J. Martin of Little-Hairſhaw, likeways James Armour merchant in Glaſgow, William Muir and Hilbert Wales, &c. I might alſo here mention the caſe of ſeveral excellent gentlewomen, as the lady Colvil, the lady St. Ford, the lady Tilen, and her ſon about eleven years of age, who had been impriſoned with her for conventicles, lady Skermorly, lady Abdean, who, after a great deal of trouble, were ſet at liberty; lady Mary Hope was outlawed, or put to the horn, for not appearing. But I chuſe to omit particulars concerning theſe perſons, and to go on to relate things as they happened in order of time.

On the 11th of February the council recommended to a commitie to enquire into and make a report of the caſe of thoſe in the priſons of Edinburgh and Canongate. They made their report on the 16th, by which it appeared that ſeveral who complied to take the teſt, or the oath of allegiance were ſet at liberty. John Smith and James Ruſſel were remitted to the juſtices, and 14 ordered for the plantations.

On the 19th the commiſſion court for Dumbarton fined John Napier of Kilmahew in 2000 l. ſterling for not appearing, John Zuil of Darleith 1000 l. ſterling for refuſing the teſt, John Campbell of Carrick 1500 l. ſterling for himſelf and lady, for hearing ejected miniſters, and Iſabel Buchanan, in 100 l. ſterling, and ordered them to be impriſoned till they paid their fines, or give ſatisfaction to the duke of Queenſberry the lord treaſurer.

Mr Zuil of Darleith was put into the caſtle of Dumbarton. In March his lady died of a fever. Darleith was not ſuffered to ſee her when dying, only, as a mighty favour, he was permitted to go out till four days after her funeral, when his ſon and ſon in law gave a bond for 1000 l. ſterling, that he ſhould return to priſon when that time was expired. He returned, and continued in hold the ſpace of 18 or 20 months; but by his want of accommodation, he contracted a conſumption of which he died in January 1688.

The murdering work went on in the fields. Accordingly, on the ſaid 19th of February, Captain Bruce and a party ſurpriſed ſix of the wanderers in Lochinkit muir, in the pariſh of Kirkpatrick in Galloway, viz. William Herron, John Gordon, William Stuart, and John Wallace, whom he ordered to be ſhot without any proceſs. He carried A. MacRobine or MacUbine, and Edward Gordon, the other two to the bridge of Orr, where Lagg was preſſing the abjuration. The captain would have theſe two tried by a jury; but Lagg ſwore they ſhould not, and, in a bravado, ſaid before the country people, that all who had taken the oath had ſwore theſe mens doom. Accordingly, next day, they were carried to the pariſh of Irongray, and were hanged up on an oak tree by Lagg's orders. When they were come to the tree, an acquaintance aſked Alexander if he had any word to ſend to his wife; he anſwered, I leave her and the two babes on the Lord, and to his promiſe; a father to the fatherleſs, and a huſband to the widow is the Lord, in his holy habitation. When the perſon employed as executioner aſked him forgiveneſs, he ſaid, Poor man, I forgive thee, and all men; thou haſt a miſerable calling upon earth. They both died in much compoſure and cheerfulneſs. On the 21ſt, Bruce, and ſome accounts ſay Col. Douglas with him, killed other five men at Kirkonnel, but their names are not known.

On the 28th, about 11 at night, lieutenant or cornet Douglas ſurrounded the houſe of Dalwin in the pariſh of Bar, with a party, and apprehended one David Martin brother to John Martin of Dalquhairn. There was one Edward Kyan who had concealed himſelf between the end of one houſe and the ſide-wall of another. Perceiving him, they dragged him out, and, without aſking any other queſtions, but where he lived, the lieutenant ſhot him through the head, firſt with one piſtol, and then with another; and one of the ſoldiers, pretending to obſerve ſome motion, ſhot him a third time. He was but a youth, and could not have been concerned in any of the riſings. Dav. Martin was next brought forth, and, when they had ſtript him of his coat, was ſet on his knees beſide the mangled body. One of the ſoldiers begged the lieutenant to ſpare him till next day, alledging they might get ſome diſcoveries from him, and then ſtept in between him and ſix ſoldiers who were preſenting their pieces. But though this prevented his death at this time, yet, through the fright and terror he was put into, he was in a great meaſure deprived of his reaſon, was ſeized with a palſy, of which he died after he had kept his bed four years. T. Abercrombies father and ſon, together with ſome women in the neighbourhood, were barbarouſly beat and wounded. One of the Abercromies and David Martin were carried with them priſoners to Colmonel next morning, being the Lord's day.

Several others were murdered in cold blood this month of February. This William Adam in Middlewelwood, attempting to eſcape a party commanded by Sir John Daziel, on account of their enſnaring queſtions, was diſcovered, and inſtantly diſpatched. Wallace, Edgar, and a third were ſhot in the pariſh of Kirkpatrick by captain Bruce. Colonel Buchan and his men ſhot one John Smith in the pariſh of Leſmahago. In the Cloud of Witneſſes we find that the ſaid coronet Douglas apprehended Edward MacKeen; and, becauſe he had a flint-ſtone about him, ordered him to be ſhot without any farther trial.

Some time this month Sir Robert Grierſon of Lagg, having the command of a part of Claverhouſe's troop and Strachan's dragoons, ſupriſed Mr John Bell of Whiteſide, David Halliday portioner in Mayfield, Andrew MacRobert, James Clement, and Robert Lenox of Irlintoun, and moſt barbarouſly killed them on the ſpot, after quarters given, without ſo much as allowing them to pray before their death, or to be buried after it. Mr Bell was the only ſon of a gentlewoman, heireſs of Whiteſide, who, after his father's death, was married to the viſcount of Kenmure. He was a gentleman of good ſenſe and unaffected piety, and had been grievouſly harraſſed ſince Bothwell. He was very well acquainted with Lagg, and only deſired a quarter of an hour to prepare for death. Lagg refuſed it, curſing and ſwearing, What the d——, have you not had time enough to prepare ſince Bothwell? A little after this the viſcount of Kenmure, Claverhouſe and Lagg happened to be in company at Kirkcudbright. Kenmure challenged Lagg for his cruelty to Mr Bell, a gentleman, and his relation, eſpecially in not permitting him to be buried, Lagg told him, with an oath, 'Take him if you will, and ſalt him in your beef barrel.' Upon this Kenmure drew, and would have run him thro', had it not been for Claverhouſe. The wickedneſs of the ſoldiers at this time was dreadful, and none worſe than this Lagg. They uſed in their cabals to take to themſelves the names of devils, and of perſons they ſuppoſed to be in hell, and, with whips, to laſh one another, as a jeſt on that place of torment. But my author juſtly draws a vail over many of their horrid acts of impiety.

The troubles of Robert Nairn of Bonhill were renewed this month. The bailie depute of the regality of Dumbarton came at midnight with two officers to his houſe. His wife was forced to take to the fields with a ſucking child, leaving three other children with a ſervant maid. When they had ſearched the houſe they took the eldeſt boy, not 15 years of age, and, drawing their ſwords, threatened to kill him if he did not tell where his father was. They took the inventory of the houſhold furniture, and arreſted all in the hands of the landlord, whom they obliged to be accountable for every thing except the cradle. They turned the two infants (the eldeſt not being five years of age) out of their beds, and carried away the bed clothes, and obliged the maid to find bail to appear when called. Next April they again ſearched his houſe, and carried his wife to priſon, where ſhe lay till ſhe found bail to keep the church. Robert ventured home next winter; but, being informed againſt, he was purſued by two men, who both fired at him, ſo that he narrowly eſcaped, and got into a wood near his own houſe, where he contracted ſuch a cold and illneſs that he was obliged to return home. This being known, two officers were ſent to carry him priſoner to Dumbarton, which they would have done, had he not been carried to a friend's houſe, about a mile from his own, where he got to his everlaſting reſt. It was with difficulty he was permitted to be buried in the churchyard of Bonhill, through the malice of the curate. His widow and eldeſt ſon were upon this brought to further trouble, which I muſt paſs over.

On the 2d of March the council received the report of the commiſſioners for the ſhire of Moray. From whence it appears that not a few had been brought under great hardſhips in thoſe northern parts. When the commiſſioners firſt arrived there they ordered all diſorderly perſons they could be informed of, in the ſhires of Banff, Roſs, and Sutherland, to be ſummoned before them at a certain day, and compleat liſt of heritors, wadſetters, &c. to be drawn up, who voluntarily, as they ſaid, offered three months ſupply to his majeſty, took the teſt, and other oaths and bonds. They examined all miniſters and elders in theſe bounds, and others concerning the ſtate of the country, and diſorderly perſons in it, libelled all perſons informed againſt, fined ſome, and baniſhed others. Particularly they ordered the laird of Foulis elder to be impriſoned at Tain, and the laird of Foulis younger at Inverneſs, in caſe he refuſed the bond of peace. They cleared the country of all whom they called outed miniſters and vagrant preachers, and baniſhed the Rev. Meſſ. James Urquhart, John Stuart, Alexander Dunbar, and George Meldrum, together with Alexander and Mark Mavers portioners of Urquhart, Donald and Andrew Monroes of Elgin, Alexander Monro ſometime of Maie, and Jean Taylor a ſervant and married woman. They fined the laird of Grant in 42,500 l. the laird of Brody 24,060 l. Alex. Brody of Lethin 40 000 l. Francis Brody of Miltoun 10,000 l. Francis Brody in Rinlee 333 l. 6 s. 8 d. Mark Maver baniſhed, in 300 l. Mr George Meldrum baniſhed in 6666 l. 13 s. 4 d. They likeways ordered Thomas Dumbar of Grange, the laird of Innes younger, William Brody of Coltfield, William Brody of Whitewray, and Mr Robert Donaldſon in Ayr, to appear when called. They whom they baniſhed were to be ſent priſoners to Edinburgh, and orders were given to apprehend the few delinquents that were abſent, and commit them to priſon till they ſhould ſign the bond of peace and regularity, and engage to keep the kirk for the time to come.

This is but a ſhort abbreviate of the report made by the lords commiſſioners: but it is eaſy to form a judgment of the oppreſſion of the country, for they had nothing to lay to the charge of any of theſe perſons but their non conformity.

This

This court conſiſted of the earls of Errol and Kintore with Sir George Monro, commonly called major-general When they came to Elgin they ordered a new gallows to be erected in terrorem Abſence from the kirk and being at conventicles, where the dreadful crimes, for none in this part of the country had been at Bothwell.

The laird of Brody had what they called a conventicle in his houſe. He went to London to get, if poſſible, ſome reaſonable compoſition made for his fine, and, after much pains and expence, was forced to give bond for 20,000 merks to one colonel Maxwell a papiſt, to whom that ſum was paid, and the colonel's acknowlegement of it is, for ought I know, ſtill among the papers of the family.

The laird of Grant gave in a petition after this to the council, ſetting forth that he had been fined becauſe his lady had confeſſed two years and a half's withdrawing from the ordinances, the keeping of an unlicenſed chaplain, and the like; and declared, that he thought it hard that a huſband ſhould be liable for his wife's withdrawing from ordinances, eſpecially as the pariſh-church was vacant for a year and a half of the time ſpecified, and the next pariſh church was ſix or ſeven miles diſtant, and that his lady for the moſt part was in a bad ſtate of health, and given over by the phyſicians, and that ſhe had never withdrawn from any principle of diſloyalty. In ſhort, he cleared himſelf from every thing laid to his charge, as the petition more fully bears; but the council found that their commiſſioners had proceeded legally and ordered him to be purſued for the fine.

A great many others were called before this court, and impriſoned at Elgin, as John Montford chamberlain to Park, Jean Brody relict of Alexander Thomſon merchant in Elgin, Chriſtian Leſly daughter, and Beatrix Brody relict of Leſly of Aikinwall, &c. When the king died the court roſe, and theſe were releaſed.

On the ſaid 2d of March the new king's indemnity was publiſhed, out of which the chief movers and inſtrument of the preſent commotions, together with all the heritors renters, wadſetters, burgeſſes, and vagrant preachers, and the murderers of archbiſhop Sharp, and of the miniſter of Carſphairn, were excepted In ſhort, none could have the benefit of it without complying with the oaths at that time impoſed. All others were to partake of this demonſtration of the king's innate clemency, which he ſays, hath ſhined in the whole line of his royal race. The affair of the Palatinate, the Iriſh maſſacre, and the proceedings of the late reign, are no great proofs of this.

The ſame day cornet Bailie met with a young man, Will. Smith, in the fields, and carried him to the garriſon becauſe he refuſed to anſwer their queſtions; and, next day, J. Lawrie of Maxweltoun, pretended to be a commiſſioner, paſſed ſentence of death upon him, notwithſtanding the interceſſion of his father and the remonſtrance of the cornet. He was immediately ſhot at the Racemuir, and died with great compoſure, and in full aſſurance of faith, declaring that he died for no rebellion, nor any crime, but converſe with the perſecuted people, and refuſing to diſcover them. Sometime this month lieutenant Murray met with one John Brown in the fields, and, without any proceſs or ſentence, ordered him to be ſhot near the Blackwood of that pariſh, though he had promiſed him quarters.

On the 6th of March, major Balfour ſeized Robert Logan, George Muir, and John Gilfillan, in the houſe of one Sarah Kirkland at Glaſgow; and, without any order from the council, ſent two of them to the plantations, and the other was ſent to Dunnotter, whither the woman was likewiſe ordered, but ſhe made her eſcape by the way. Mr Will. Boyd, who, at the revolution, was admitted miniſter at Dalry, was ſeized about this time, but ſoon got free.

On the 10th the committee made another report to the council concerning the priſoners, upon which ſome were releaſed, and others continued, and letters were diſpatched to the commiſſioners for Stirling, Glaſgow and Ayr, to offer the indemnity to all the priſoners there, and that they who ſhould be pleaſed might have a paſs, ſubſcribed either by a councellor or one of the commiſſioners.

The ſame day the council gave a warrant to the laird of Pitlochie to go to the priſons of Edinburgh, Glaſgow, and Stirling, and tranſport a hundred of the priſoners who were willing to go to the plantations, excluding all heritors who had above 100 l. rent.

By this time the rumours of Argyll's deſign upon Scotland, and of Monmouth's upon England, began to ſpread, which tended to increaſe the violences and ravages of the army, eſpecially thoſe under the command of Claverhouſe in Clydeſdale, Annandale and Nithſdale. Accordingly, on this 10th of March, all the freeholders, heritors and gentlemen, in the two laſt of theſe ſhires, were ſummoned to attend the king's ſtandard. He parcelled out the ſhire into ſo many diviſions, taking in ſix or eight miles ſquare at a time. In every diviſion, having drove all the inhabitants, without diſtinction, into one place, and aſked them ſeverally, whether they owned the duke of York, that was, for their king, he made them all ſwear to continue in their allegiance, and never do any thing againſt him. Next he demanded, whether they had taken the abjuration, or had ever repented their having done ſo; and when they declared they had not, he then made them promiſe, upon their renouncing their part in heaven, that they would never repent of what they had done. When he diſmiſſed any that complied with all this, he told him, Argyll ſhall have a perjured dog of you, If a man refuſed to ſwear, he was carried ſome few paces from the reſt, a napkin was tied over his face, and the ſoldiers ordered to fire, either blank powder, or over his head. Having thus brought him under the terror of death, he was once more offered his life, upon ſwearing and promiſing to inform againſt all diſloyal perſons; by which means not a few were brought to a compliance. Beſides theſe methods of cruelty, all the children in the diviſion, above ſix, and under ten years of age, were aſſembled, by themſelves, and a party of ſoldiers drawn out before them. Then they were bid pray, for they were going to be ſhot. Some of them would anſwer, Sir, we cannot pray. Then they were required to tell when they ſaw men and guns in their houſe, or if any men, with guns and ſwords, got meat or drink in their houſes; but it would be endleſs to mention all the unaccountable proceedings of Claverhouſe and his men; neither is there any occaſion for making remarks on theſe things.

On the 12th of March the marquis of Athol received orders to raiſe 500 Highlanders for ſecuring the peace of the ſhire of Argyll; from which it would ſeem the miniſtry had early information of Argyll's intended invaſion.

The ſame day the council ordered the magiſtrates of Edinburgh to releaſe Mr Andrew Miller indulged miniſter at Neilſtoun, Mr James Curry at Shotts, Mr A. Murray at Woodend, and Mr Robert Mowat at Heriot who had for ſome time been impriſoned for not obſerving their inſtructions; and, on the 14th, Mr Campbell, and Mr Duncanſon were ordered to be releaſed. Some time after this Mr And. MacLean, Mr P. Campbell, Mr David Simpſon, indulged miniſters in Argyll ſhire, Mr John Oliphant, and other indulged miniſters, were, about this time, ſet at liberty, and returned to their own houſes where they ſometimes preached, but no more in the churches: and in this ſituation matters continued till the liberty 1687. The acts by which they were releaſed, obliged them to engage not to exerciſe any part of their miniſtry within the kingdom; but it does not appear they complied with this.

On the 24th ſome of the hearers of Mr Renwick were obſerved going and coming from his ſermons in arms, and therefore the council impowered colonel Douglaſs, and the commanders of the garriſons, to puniſh the common people who did not inform againſt them, and to oblige the heritors on whoſe grounds they were ſeen, to appear before the council in April next. But we have had ſo many commiſſions of this nature formerly, that there is no occaſion, either to inſert this, or make any remarks upon it. Only, from the council regiſters, it appears, that James Napier, Allan Atkin, and John Peirſon were condemned to die for concealing the rebels who went through the ſhire of Ayr; but were afterwards pardoned.

We left Mr Alex. Shields in Newgate, from thence he and other ſeven, who were apprehended with him, being Scotchmen, were, on the 4th of March put on board the kitchen-yacht for Scotland. They landed at Leith

Leith on the 13th, and next day Mr Shields was examined before a committee of the council, where, being on the reserve, he was remanded to prison till the 23d, when he was brought before the justiciary, and interrogated, whether he would abjure the apologetic declaration, and own the authority of king James VII. and being still on the reserve, he was sent back till the 25th, and from thence continued to the day following, when he was again brought before the justiciary, and examined to the effect foresaid, with renewed threatenings of the most severe usage if he did not satisfy them; whereupon he gave in the following minute in writing, viz. Upon as serious and mature deliberation as my disordered mind could be capable of in this hurry and surprise, consulting both the declaration itself, that I am commanded to give my insignificant sentiments of, and consulting his majesty's proclamation, to find out that which is offensive to your lordships in it, advising also with the opinion of the lords of council and session, upon refusing to answer when questioned about it, the result of my thoughts is, in the sincerity of an unfeigned conscience, and in the fear of God, that I do abhor, renounce and disown that and all other declarations, in so far as that or they do declare war against the king, expressly, proposedly or designedly, and asserts that it is lawful to kill all that are employed by his majesty, or any because so employed, in church, state, army or country.' When the court read this, they said it was satisfactory, and required him to hold up his hand. This he refused, till, being allowed to dictate unto the clerk in what words he would swear, he said, 'I do abhor, renounce and disown, in the presence of God, that pretended declaration, in so far as it declares war against the king, and asserts that it is lawful to kill all employed by him, in church, state, army or country.' Then, protesting it might not be constructed in any other sense than the genuine meaning of the words he had delivered in the minute before insert, he did subscribe and swear it. That which, he says, did induce him to it, was, that they gave it in his own meaning; and so far was his mind deceived, that by a quibble and nice distinction, he thought the words might bear, that this was not a disowning of that, nor no declaration which ever he saw, (save one of their pretending) nor that neither, but only in so far as, or if so be, which two different expressions he was taught to confound by schoolastic notions instilled into him by the court, and by some of the indulged ministers who were in prison with him. Having so done, the justiciary dismissed him; but, on pretence of his being the council's prisoner, he was sent back to his now, more than ever, weary lodging; for he had no sooner made the above foolish, unfaithful and dishonourable step of compliance, as he justly calls it, than his conscience smote him, and, continuing to do so, he aggravates his fall in such sort as I have scarce heard of a parallel, and laments over it as what he could not find words to express, nor groans to bemoan it enough. In which condition he continued for some considerable time; and so we leave him till we bring forward concurring transactions.

On the 30th of March Thomas Kennedy of Grange, John Kennedy of Glenure, and Gilbert MacMichan of Kilsaint ninians, were prosecuted before the justiciary, for accession to Bothwell. Next day Kennedy of Grange was condemned to be executed when apprehended, Kennedy of Glenure was acquitted; but what the issue was with respect to Gilbert MacMichan is not known.

As I am now come to relate what happened in the month of April, I might observe, in general, that the soldiers continued to harass the country; that they instructed some to be spies upon the wanderers, by feigning themselves of their principles, and, when they found out their lurking places, by informing against them. A body of Highlanders was brought down to assist the regular troops; but I omit all this, as having had frequent opportunity to lay before the reader many unprecedented instances of oppression committed by the soldiers and officers.

On the 9th of April the duke of Queensberry's commission to be the king's commissioner in the ensuing session of parliament was read in council. 'Upon king Charles's death the marquis of Queensberry, soon after made a duke and the earl of Perth, came to court. The duke of Queensberry told the king, that, if he had any thoughts of changing the established religion, he could not make any one step with him in the matter. The king seemed to receive this very kindly, and assured him he had no such intention, but that he would have a parliament called, to which he should go his commissioner, and give all possible assurances in the matter of religion, and get the revenue to be settled, and such other laws to be passed as might be necessary for the common safety. The duke of Queensberry pressed the earl of Perth to speak in the same strain to the king; but, though he pretended to be still a protestant, yet he could not prevail on him to speak in so positive a style. The duke frequently, since that time, told bishop Burnet, that the king made these promises to him in so frank and hearty a manner, that he concluded it was impossible for him to be acting a part; therefore he always believed that the priests gave him leave to promise every thing, and that he did it very sincerely; but that afterwards they pretended they had a power to dissolve the obligation of all oaths and promises.' The order of time leads me now to speak of Argyll.

The deliberations in Holland, says the historian of his own time, among the English and Scots that fled thither, come to ripen faster than was expected. Lord Argyll had been quiet ever since 1683, and had lived mostly in Friesland, though he came frequently to Amsterdam, and met with several of his countrymen who lay concealed there, the chief of whom were the lord Melvil, Sir Pat. Hume, and Sir John Cochran. With these his lordship communicated all the advices he received. In short, upon the death of the late king he judged he had a favourable opportunity to attempt the rescue of his country, from the popery and slavery wherewith it was threatened by the accession of the duke of York, and therefore resolved to make a descent upon Scotland, where he hoped to be joined by a number sufficient for answering his design; and at the same time prevailed with the duke of Monmouth to make a descent upon England; but Argyll wanted money, which could not but be a great bank to this undertaking: however, that want was supplied by means of a rich widow in Amsterdam, who furnished him with 10 000 l. sterling. With this he bought a stock of arms and ammunition, which was very dexterously managed by one who traded at Venice, as if intended for the service of that republic.

On the 7th of April there was a meeting at Amsterdam at which were present the earl of Argyll, Mr Charles Campbell his son, Sir John Cochran of Ochiltree, Sir Pat. Hume of Polwart, George Pringle of Torwoodlee, Will. Denholm of Westshields, Geo. Hume of Bassinden, John Cochran of Waterside, Mr George Wishart, Will. Clelland, James Stuart advocate, and Mr Gilbert Elliot. Sir John Cochran was chosen preses for that time. At this meeting it was unanimously Resolved.

'That the above named persons, and other gentlemen, of the kingdom of Scotland joining with them, in a great undertaking intended by them in the defence and for the recovery of the religion, rights and liberties of the kingdom of Scotland, shall assume and take upon them the quality and character of a council, for consulting and determining whatsoever relates to that great undertaking, and management thereof; and that, so soon as they come to Scotland, such of the nation as shall join themselves to them, in the prosecution of the said undertaking, shall likewise have access unto, and be joined in the foresaid council.

The persons aforesaid, in the character and quality, above expressed, do resolve to make war ——— against James duke of Albany and York, and such as shall adhere to him: and for the command and conduct of the army they shall be able to gather together, they unanimously appoint Archibald earl of Argyll to the office of captain general.——Mr William Spence their clerk, and recommend to the said James Stuart to perfect the declaration of war they design to publish, and that against Monday next. It is farther resolved.

That Mr William Veitch, Mr George Barclay and William Clelland be dispatched to Scotland, and instructed for that effect; and that the earl of Argyll, Sir John Cochran

Cochran, Sir Patrick Hume, George Pringle, and William Denholm, met to morrow at the earl's chamber at eight o'clock in the morning, to expede their inſtructions; and adjourn their meeting till Monday at eight o'clock at night to Sir John Cochran's chamber.'

No doubt they met at the time and place appointed, and probably agreed to the draught of their declaration; and thus far they were harmonious; but after this, according to biſhop Burnet, 'they had ſharp debates about the courſe they were to hold. Argyll was for ſailing round Scotland to his own country. Hume was for the ſhorter paſſage, the other being a long navigation, and ſubject to great accidents. Argyll ſaid, the faſtneſſes of his own country made that to be the ſafer place to gather them together. He preſumed ſo far on his own power, and on his management hitherto, that he took much upon him; ſo that the reſt were often on the point of breaking with him. The duke of Monmouth came ſecretly to them and made up all their quarrels, and would willingly have gone with them himſelf; but Argyll did not offer him the command: on the contrary he preſſed him to make an impreſſion on England;' and by that means they were both hurried to a precipitate undertaking, before matters were ripe for it. But to return to Scotland.

On the 21ſt of April the duke of Hamilton, the earl of Dumfries, and colonel Douglas, were added to the council; and, on the 25th, lieutenant-general Drummond was ſent weſt to haraſs the country for the old pretended reſet and converſe. We have had ſeveral commiſſions of this nature before now, ſo there is no occaſion to inſert any thing farther as to this.

On the 29th the parliament ſat down, which was juſt a few days before Argyll ſet ſail from Holland, and not after the defeat of that expedition, as biſhop Burnet, thro' miſtake, tells us. The laſt parliament 1681 was under the conduct of a popiſh commiſſioner; and this entirely ſubſerved the deſigns of a popiſh king. Here the finiſhing ſtrong was given to the nation's liberties, and the king's diſpenſing power eſtabliſhed by law. Bloody and deteſtable ſtatutes were here enacted, that are, to the indelible infamy of the projectors, a ſcandal to the proteſtant name, a terror to that age, and a warning, it is hoped, to all poſterity, of the native tendency of abſolute power and indefeaſible right.

The firſt thing the parliament was entertained with, was the king's letter, of which I cannot but give the following abbreviate.

JAMES R.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

THE many experiences we have had of the loyalty and examplary forwardneſs of that our ancient kingdom, by their repreſentatives in parliament aſſembled, in the reign of our deareſt——brother,——— made us deſirous to call you,———in the beginning of our reign, to give you an opportunity, not only of ſhewing your duty to us in the ſame manner, but likeways in being exemplary to others, in your———compliance with our deſires, as you have moſt eminently been in times paſt, to a degree never to be forgotten by us.——That which we are at this time to propoſe, is what is as neceſſary for your ſafety as our ſervice, and what has a tendency more to ſecure your own privileges and properties, than the aggrandizing our power and authority (though in it conſiſts the greateſt ſecurity of your rights and intereſts, theſe never having been in danger, except when the royal power was brought too low to protect them) which now we reſolve to maintain in its greateſt luſtre, to the end we may be the more enabled to defend and protect your religion, as eſtabliſhed by law, and your rights and properties—— againſt fanatical contrivances, murders and aſſaſſins, who, having no fear of God, more than honour for us, have brought you into ſuch difficulties, as only the bleſſing of God upon the ſteady reſolutions and actings of our ſaid deareſt royal brother, and thoſe employed by him (in proſecution of the good and wholeſom laws by you hereto fore offered) could have ſaved you from the moſt horrid confuſions and inevitable ruin. Nothing has been left unattempted, by thoſe wild and unhuman traitors, for endeavouring to overturn your peace, and therefore we—— hope that nothing will be wanting in you to ſecure yourſelves and us, from their outrages and violence in time coming, and to take care that ſuch conſpirators meet with their juſt deſervings, ſo as others may thereby be deterred from courſes ſo little agreeable to religion, or their duty and allegiance to us.' The reſt of the letter is made up of encomiums upon the duke of Queenſberry the commiſſioner, and expreſſes his majeſty's hopes that this parliament would readily concur with whatever ſhould be propoſed to them.

There is ſcarce occaſion for any remarks on this letter, king James aſſures them he will defend and protect their religion, though, at the ſame time, he will take care that his authority ſhall ſhine in the greateſt luſtre; and therefore recommends to them to bring thoſe, whom he brands with the odious names of murderers and aſſaſſins, to condign puniſhment; but it is well known that the ſufferers deteſted all principles of aſſaſſination, while the ſoldiers murdered by authority. I ſhall not trouble the reader with the ſpeeches of the commiſſioner and chancellor, which followed the reading of the royal letter, nor with the parliament's anſwer to it, which was the echo of it, farther than to obſerve, that they promiſed to leave nothing undone to extirpate all fanaticiſm, eſpecially fanatical murderers and aſſaſſins.

The firſt thing they did was a ſhort and general act for the ſecurity of the proteſtant religion, which paſſed without a complaint of any defect, ſince thoſe patriots who oppoſed the teſt were out of the way; but there was little ground, notwithſtanding all laws, nay, and royal aſſurances, to expect the ſecurity of the proteſtant religion, under a popiſh prince, whom, to their ſhame, they owned as abſolute, as appears from their offer of duty, and declaration; in which among other things they ſay, 'That they abhor and deteſt not only the authors and actors of all preceeding rebellions againſt the ſovereign, but likewiſe all principles and poſitions which are contrary or derogatory to the king's ſacred, ſupreme ſovereign, abſolute power and authority, which none, whether perſons, or collective bodies, can participate of any manner of way, or upon any pretext, but in dependence on him, and by commiſſion from him. And as their duty formerly did bind them to own and aſſert the juſt and legal ſucceſſion of the ſacred line as unalterable by any human juriſdiction, ſo now, on this occaſion, they, for themſelves, and the whole nation repreſented by them, in moſt humble and dutiful manner, do renew the hearty and ſincere offer of their lives and fortunes, to aſſert ſupport, defend and maintain King James VII. their preſent glorious monarch, and his heirs and lawful ſucceſſors, in the poſſeſſions of their crowns, ſovereignty, prerogatives &c. againſt all mortals.'

The ſame day the council in reſpect of the forewarned invaſion, publiſhed a proclamation for putting the kingdom in a poſture of defence. It is not worth while to take notice of the flattering title given to the late king, our deareſt brother of renowned and eternal memory. By this proclamation the militia in the eaſtern ſhires, and all able to bear arms in the northern ſhires, were commanded to be in readineſs with 14 days proviſions; and particular care was taken of the ſea-coaſt towns. All this preparation was no more than might have been expected.

Next day, April 29th, the Marquis of Athol was made Lord Lieutenant of the ſhires of Argyll and Tarbet, and ordered to march thither with ſome forces; and wherever he marched, the people were obliged to furniſh them with baggage horſes.

The ſame day a moſt bloody murder was committed upon five perſons near Ingliſtoun in the pariſh of Glencairn. One Andrew Watſon, perhaps the ſame concerned in the murder of the curate of Carſphairn, was an artful ſpy among the hiding people, who, after that affair, deſerted them. He got himſelf apprehended, and a ſham ſentence of death paſſed upon him. He eſcaped, and tried to join the wanderers once more; but they would have nothing to do with him, whereupon he threw off the maſk, and liſted himſelf for a ſoldier. Being tolerably well acquainted with their hiding places, he diſcovered a cave, near Ingliſtoun, which had been a place of ſecrecy among them for ſome years. Colonel James Douglaſs and lieutenant Livingſtone came ſuddenly to this cave, where they ſurpriſed John, brother to James Gibſon, the heritor of the place, James Kennoch in Glencairn pariſh, Robert Edgar, Robert Mitchel and Robert Grierſon. The ſoldiers fired into the cave, by which one of them was wounded. Then they ruſhed in, and, without aſking any queſtions, or making any offers, Douglaſs condemned them to be ſhot directly. John Gibſon was firſt permitted to pray, which he did to the admiration of the ſoldiers. He ſung part of Pſalm xvii. read John xvi. and, after he prayed was ſhot. He had a ſhort interview with his ſiſter, and told her, that this was the moſt joyful day he ever had. His mother alſo got acceſs to him, and he requeſted her not to grieve, but to bleſs the Lord on his account, who had made him both willing and ready to ſuffer for his cauſe and intereſt. The reſt were diſpatched all at once, without being allowed to pray ſeparately. One of them was not killed outright, which one Ferguſon, an apoſtate, obſerving, he thruſt him through the body with his ſword. The laſt words that poor man ſpoke were, Though every hair of my head were a man, I am willing to die all thoſe deaths for Chriſt and his cauſe. They ly buried in the church-yard of Glencairn.

About this time the heritor of Inglinſtoun had his lands given to the laird of Stonehouſe, who not only poſſeſſed the eſtate, but ſeized on 20481. of lady Inglinſtoun's portion, and reduced her and her children to the greateſt ſtraits, merely for pretended converſe with her ſons and friends who could not conform to the iniquity of the times.

Some time this month Dundaſs, the commander of Balquhan garriſon, being informed of one John Semple in the pariſh of Dally in the ſhire of Ayr, detached a party along with Ferguſon the informer, who about midnight ſurrounded the houſe. John hearing a confuſed noiſe of feet, and judging what it was, tried to eſcape out at a back window; but five or ſix of the party obſerving him, diſcharged their pieces, and killed him on the ſpot. It was in this month of April that one Peter Inglis ſhot John Burie in the pariſh of Evandale, though he had his paſs in his hand.

The month of May continues the bloody ſcene. The morning of the firſt day of this month was uſhered in with the barbarous murder of John Brown in Prieſtfield the pariſh of Muirkirk a pious ſolid Chriſtian, and of great uſe to young people. He was a carrier to his employment, and was uſually nicknamed the Chriſtian Carrier. This morning between five and ſix o'clock, he went to his work, and was ſurrounded by Claverhouſe, with three troops of horſe, and brought back to his own houſe. After he had diſtinctly anſwered ſome queſtions, Claverhouſe ſaid to him, 'Go to your prayers, for you ſhall immediately die;' and, when praying, he interrupted him three times. After he had done, he ſaid to his wife, who was preſent with her child in her arms, and another child of his firſt wife's, 'Now, Iſabel, the day is come of which I told you when I firſt propoſed marriage to you.' To which ſhe replied, 'Indeed, John, I can willingly part with you.' This, ſaid he, 'is all I deſire; I have no more to do but die; I have been in caſe to meet death for many years:' and then he kiſſed his wife and children, and bleſſed them, wiſhing all purchaſed and promiſed bleſſings to be multiplied upon them. Then Claverhouſe ordered ſix ſoldiers to ſhoot him; which being done, the wretch ſaid to the widow, 'What thinkeſt thou of thy huſband now woman?' She ſaid, I ever thought much good of him, and as much now as ever.' He ſaid, 'It were but juſtice to lay thee there beſide him.' She replied, 'If you were permitted, I doubt not but your cruelty would go that length; but how will you anſwer for this morning's work?' He anſwered, 'To man I can be anſwerable, and as for God, I'll take him in mine own hand.'

He then marched off, and left her with the corpſe. She ſet the child on the ground, gathered his ſcattered brains, tied up his head, covered his body with her plaid, and ſat down and wept over him. He was buried at the end of his own houſe. Claverhouſe is ſaid to have frequently acknowledged, that John Brown's prayer made ſuch impreſſions on his ſpirit, that he could never get them worn off when he gave himſelf liberty to think.

On this firſt of May the parliament made two acts for faciiitating proceſſes for treaſon now depending before the juſticiary. By the one they ratified the cuſtom formerly uſed, in proceeding againſt priſoners in 24 hours: but, for the future, allowed them to be cited in 48 hours: So that by this a parliamentary pardon and protection was given for former violations of the rights and liberties of mankind; and two days were only granted for men to make their defences upon life and death. The other act ordains, that if thoſe who are ſummoned as witneſſes, in caſe of treaſon, houſe or field conventicles, or church-irregularities, refuſe to ſwear, they ſhall be liable to be puniſhed as guilty of thoſe crimes in which they refuſe to be witneſſes. The iniquity of this act cannot but be obvious.

By this time the earl of Argyll, being ready for his expedition, and the duke of Monmouth having engaged that he would not ſtay in Holland ten days after him, embarked, on the firſt of May, with three ſhips, and a conſiderable number of arms, and in three days reached Orkney. They had not above 300 men in all. Mr Blackadder, ſon to Mr John Blackadder, was ſent aſhore to get intelligence, Mr W. Spence went with him to viſit an uncle of his at Kirkwall the chief town; but both, being diſcovered, were apprehended by the old biſhop there. Mr Blackadder was afterwards pardoned. This alarmed the country. Argyll was for ſending a party of fuſileers to recover the two gentlemen; but he was diſſuaded from the attempt, and only a few priſoners were taken. From Orkney they ſteered their courſe by the inſide of the weſtern iſlands; and, had they got in time to Iſlay, would have ſurpriſed Balechan with a party of 4 or 500 men; but they came juſt an hour too late. They next dropt anchor near Tobermore in Mull, where they were detained three days, which, was very much to their diſadvantage. From Mull they ſailed to Kintyre; and here they were diſappointed of many whom they expected would join them. However, his lordſhip, and thoſe with him, publiſhed their declaration, which, as we have related, was drawn up by Mr James Stuart advocate. A ſhort abbreviate of it cannot but be acceptable to the reader, and is as follows.

THEY muſt be altogether ſtrangers——in the chriſtian world, who——are not fully convinced——that the whole reign of Charles II.———was a conſtant and uniform courſe of perjury, apoſtacy, and violence, begun with open rebellion againſt God; the reſcinding not only of particular laws, but——of whole unexceptionable parliaments for the ſpace of 27 years preceding——and the cruel ſhedding of the beſt proteſtant blood, in the moſt unjuſt execution of the Marquis of Argyll, and many other worthies, contrary to all law and reaſon, carried on by the ſmiting and caſting out of more faithful and pious paſtors, and ſcattering—more true flocks and followers of Chriſt, than was done in moſt of the ten primitive perſecutions, and the deluging of theſe lands with all theſe villainous debaucheries and abominable licentiouſneſs,——and thenceforward accompliſhed by a moſt unrelenting perſecution and oppreſſion of the generality of God's people in their conſciences, perſons, and eſtates,—in the following particulars—all too evidently ſeen and heavily felt to need any explicit proof or demonſtration. As, 1ms, Not only in the abovementioned open and avowed revolting from God.——

But next, and more particularly, in the conniving at papiſts, their meetings and idolatrous maſſes, while, in the mean time, all proteſtant nonconformiſts are perſecuted with endleſs ſeverities; the raiſing, keeping up, and increaſing ſtanding forces,——the exalting the king's ſupremacy——about the external government and policy of the church;—the ſtrange perverſion of the high truſt of the militia committed to his majeſty, for the protection of good ſubjects, only to the invading and oppreſſing, by lawleſs hoſts, both of highlanders and lowlanders, the beſt parts of the kingdom;—the forcing of poor people, by—exorbitant finings, impriſonments—for the ſimple cauſe of nonconformity, to take arms in their own defence, as at Pentland, Bothwell-bridge, and then demeaning and executing them, what in fields, and what on ſcaffolds, as the

the moſt deſperate traitors; and, at the ſame time, involving whole countries, upon the moſt ſlender and abſurd pretexts of inevitable intercommunings and reſet, both in their crime and puniſhment; the ſetting up the moſt violent—men to be miniſters of the law, and packing juries to the worſt ends;——the tranſporting of freemen as ſlaves; —— the torturing of ſeveral, —— even five times more of conſcientious nonconformiſts, within theſe twenty years, than of all ſorts of felons and malefactors in Scotland theſe hundred years bypaſt;——the cruel executing to the death of ſeveral hundreds,——ſome of them for their bare opinion about the king's breach of truſt, never before by them vented, but ſimply declared upon examination, and moſt part of them diſpatched with that barbarous inhumanity, as that —— they were, by beating of drums, hindered to ſpeak to the people their laſt and dying words; and ſome of them—tried, ſentenced, and put to death in one day, yea, the time and hour of their death induſtriouſly concealed from them, that they might be cut off by a more mortal ſurpriſe; —— the impoſing and preſſing of oaths without law; —— the eating up of men by free quarters,——the harraſſing the beſt parts of the country by four extraordinary circuits, upon one and the ſame ſubject of Bothwell-bridge, on purpoſe, as it were, to juſtify his highneſs's judgment to his late majeſty, that it would not be well with Scotland——till the ſouth of Forth was turned to a hunting field; —— the induſtrious ſtifling —— the detection of all popiſh plots; —— the ſhamming of mock-plots upon good proteſtants, —— and generally in the ſtudied and conſtant enſnaring —— all eſteemed either fixed to the proteſtant intereſt, or well affected to their country's liberty.

This wicked myſtery, we ſay, and conſpiracy of popery and tyranny,——having made ſo great a progreſs, by the ſteps abovementioned, is now at length evidently diſcloſed —— by the moſt ſuſpicious —— cutting off of the late king;——the aſcending of James duke of York to the throne.——notwithſtanding his being twice excluded by the commons of England; and that he neither hath given, nor can give, without an hypocritical and damning cheat, repugnant to his profeſſion, and contemptible to all ingenuous men, the oath and ſecurity indiſpenſibly required of him before and at his entry to the government, &c. &c.

Which things, being all of them either palpable perverſions, or utterly inconſiſtent with the true and great ends of government, rendering our commonwealth our common calamity, and Him, who pretends to be its protector, its moſt hoſtile enemy,—— we have been, and are obliged and conſtrained, by extreme neceſſity, and for common ſafety, (the ſupreme laws,) to take up juſt and neceſſary arms, in the name and fear of the great God, and the confidence of his mercy and aſſiſtance, for our own and our country's relief from the foreſaid moſt grievous and intolerable tyrannies and oppreſſions, the defence and re-eſtabliſhment of the true and pure chriſtian religion, commonly called proteſtant, in oppoſition to that antichriſtian Roman religion, commonly called papiſtical, and the recovery and re-eſtabliſhment of all our juſt rights, liberties, and privileges, according as we ſtand indiſpenſibly engaged thereto, both before God and man; and that againſt the ſaid James duke of York, and all other his accomplices, our moſt natural and wicked enemies and oppreſſors; deſiring, in the firſt place, to be deeply humbled, each of us, before God, for our manifold ſins and provocations, eſpecially our falſe heartedneſs and unſtedfaſtneſs in, and revoltings from our great and manifold engagements to him that alone hath brought upon us all theſe ſad miſchiefs; earneſtly and with our whole hearts, ſupplicating that he would ceaſe from his anger, cauſe his face to ſhine upon us, and ſave us for his own name's ſake. And, in the next place, declaring, —— that our ——ends and deſigns, in this our undertaking, are, 1*ſt*, The reſtoring and ſettling the aforeſaid true reformed Proteſtant religion.—— 2*dly*, The ſuppreſſion and perpetual excluſion of antichriſtian popery, with all its idolatrous ſuperſtitions and falſhood; and alſo its moſt bitter root and offspring prelacy, with its new and wicked head the ſupremacy, and all their abuſes.——And, 3*dly*, The reſtoring of all men to their juſt rights and liberties, eſpecially the recompenſing of all ſufferers, whether unto blood, the loſs of liberty and goods, &c.——which things, as we—— hope to accompliſh, only through the preſence of our God with us,——ſo we are moſt willing and reſolved that they be all ſettled and perfected by a free, full, juſt, and ſovereign repreſentative of all the preſent undertakers, and ſuch as ſhall hereafter ſincerely concur and take part with us; and that in ſuch forms and ways as God, by his good providence, can only moſt happily direct and conduct us unto; declaring and proteſting farther, that, ſince ſuch have been——the treachery, perfidy, &c. of our adverſaries,—we will never enter into any terms of capitulation——with them.——

After ſignifying their reſolution to proſecute theſe things, they conclude with a moſt pathetic invitation to all the lovers of truth to concur and join with them; but this declaration had not that influence on the minds of people that might have been expected. The ſocieties thought that it opened a door for a too promiſcuous admiſſion.

When they were at Mull, the earl ſent letters to his friends by his ſon Mr Charles, who went aſhore at the caſtle of Dunſtaffnage, and uſed all his intereſt in that country, which had little ſucceſs, only a few joined him there; for they whom he took for his friends baſely diſcovered all, and others were very backward to join him; and all that Mr Charles got done, was placing a garriſon in the caſtle of Barnaſory, the dwelling of Sir Duncan Campbell of Auchinbreck.

The earl continued a conſiderable time in Kintyre, in expectation of having his numbers greatly increaſed; but he had only one addition of about 300 foot and 100 horſe. However, he received news that Auchinbreck's men were ready, whom the earl ordered him to march with to the Tarbet, and afterwards joined him there, with his three companies from Iſlay, and three from Kintyre, commanded by colonel Aylief, Robert Elphinſtoun of Lapneſs, and major John Campbell, afterward executed at Inverary, and a troop of horſe commanded by colonel Rumbold. At the Tarbet, on the 27th of May, Argyll printed and diſperſed his declaration to his vaſſals; which the reader will find in my author's appendix, N° 113. Here about 1000 men joined his lordſhip, who new-modelled his little army; but I muſt leave him for a while, till I relate ſome interveening particulars.

On the 6th of May, 'John MacGhie of Larg in Galloway deceaſed, J. Ruſſel of Cateraig, and John Ruſſel of Arnes in Dumbartonſhire, were forfeited, and their blood tainted; and the two laſt ordered to be executed when apprehended, for acceſſion to Bothwell.'

The ſame day Peter Gillies in Muirendſide, John Bryce in Weſtcalder, William Finneſon or Fiddiſon, and Thomas Young, both of the pariſh of Carluke, and John Binning, were hanged upon one gibbet, without being ſuffered ſo much as to pray at their death. Peter Gillies ſuffered conſiderably for his non conformity, during ſome of the preceding years; but the day before the highlanders came to Falkirk, Mr Andrew Ure, the curate of Muirendſide, got a party ſent to his houſe next day. Accordingly he and John Bryce were both apprehended, and Peter was threatened with immediate death, in preſence of his wife, who was brought to bed but a few days before, and was hurried away, without being ſuffered either to ſpeak to her, or change his cloaths. About an hour after a party came back, and told her that he ſignified that ſhe knew were his arms were, and that if ſhe diſcovered them he ſhould not be ſhot. She calmly told them, 'he had no arms that ſhe knew of; and if they got power to take his life, ſhe would endeavour to ſay, God is the will of the Lord, and he, who did all things well, could not wrong her nor hers.' This put them into ſuch a paſſion, that they threatened to burn her where ſhe lay, &c. They rifled the houſe, and took whatever they could carry with them, except ſome bibles, which they threw away. The two men were tied together, and driven before them. When they were got about a few miles, they tied a napkin about Peter's face, ſet him on his knees, with a file of muſqueteers before him, and kept him half an hour in this poſtureture, and then carried him to the west country. 'As they marched through the parish of Carluke, they apprehended William Finneson and Thomas Young, and carried these four prisoners to Mauchlin, and seized one John Binning keeping some cattle, and took their bibles from them.' The day they were carried to Mauchlin, Peter Gillies wrote a most affectionate pious letter to his wife; and, when there, they were examined by lieutenant-general Drummond, indicted on the 5th of May, and a jury of fifteen soldiers was impannelled, who, on the 6th, condemned them to be hanged at the town's end: which being done, the soldiers and two countrymen made a hole in the earth, and threw them all in together.

On the same 6th of May the parliament passed three acts. The first was against the covenants, by which it was declared, 'That the giving or taking the national covenant, as explained 1638, or of the league and covenant, (so commonly called,) or writing in defence thereof, or owning them as lawful, or obligatory upon themselves, or others, shall infer the crime and pains of treason.' This was a home-thrust; but very agreeable to the first parliament of a popish king, and highly proper for the introduction of popery, the national covenant having, ever since the reformation, been accounted the barrier against the Roman antichrist. Great contempt had been cast on those sacred engagements, by the first parliament after the restoration; but now the giving or taking of them, nay, the writing in defence of them, or the bare owning of them as lawful and obligatory, are declared treasonable. This was certainly iniquity established by a law; and whatever slights are, or have been cast on these covenants, yet they were the glory of the nation; and it has been unanswerably proved, that nothing is contained in those solemn transactions, but what, as my author justly observes, prior to the superadded religion and tie of these oaths, was morally obliging on the consciences of all by the divine law. In short, this was an act that could never have been made but by apostate protestants under a popish prince.

By their next act the conduct of the council and their commissioners, in having fined husbands for their wives withdrawing from ordinances, was approved of and declared legal; and the same conduct was ordained to be observed in all time coming. It is sufficient here to observe, that this parliament declared a practice legal for which there never was any law.

The 3d act confirmed the sentence of forfeiture, and all the proceeding against J. Porterfield of Douchal, declaring the same to be agreeable to the laws of the kingdom; and enacted, that the concealing, and not revealing of supplies given to, or demanded for traitors, is treason, and to be judged accordingly.

On the 8th the parliament passed other three acts. By the first it was ordained, that all who shall afterwards preach at house or field conventicles, or be present as hearers, at field conventicles, shall be punished with death and confiscation of goods. This act discovers the true spirit of antichrist, and nothing can be offered as an excuse for it, but that those at the helm were either papists, or acted from the principles of slavery and oppression. It was reckoned a house-conventicle, if five more than the family were present; so that whoever were guilty of preaching, (not against the government; for, had that limitation been made, there might have been some colourable pretence for this severity) in such cases, were to be punished with death. If there was sermon in any house where any were hearing without doors, that was a field conventicle; and now not the preacher only, but the hearers of it, were by this act condemned to die. If the reader consider vol. 1. p. 322, that there are some limitations there, but here are none, he cannot but be furnished with materials for proper reflections.

I pass over the act for judicial confessions, and only observe, that the last act passed this day, declared all subjects, who refused to accept the offices of magistrates, justices of the peace, constables, officers of the militia, or any other employment laid upon them by his Majesty, or his council, to be finable for their contempt; so that it must be a happiness to be out of Scotland at this time.

On the 11th of May the council issued a proclamation, ordering all capable of bearing arms to be ready. This was no more than might have been expected, considering the news they must have received concerning Argyll; but the blood shed this day may justly fill all, who have any bowels of compassion, with indignation and horror.

It was this 11th of May that Margaret MacLauchlan and Margaret Wilson were cruelly executed at Wigton. The reverend Mr Rowan, minister at Penningham, where Margaret Wilson lived, was at pains to have the circumstances of this affair well vouched by credible witnesses, from whose attestations my author gives this narrative.

Gilbert Wilson, Margaret's father, was episcopalian, and nothing was objected against the regularity of her mother; but their children would by no means conform, and were therefore obliged to flee to the hills, bogs, and caves, to avoid the fury of the persecutors, though they were scarcely of age to be obnoxious to the laws then in force. Mean while their parents were charged, at their highest peril, not to harbour or supply them, not to speak to them, or so much as see them, without informing against them; and their father was fined for their alledged irregularities, and otherwise harassed by the quartering of soldiers, and by the oppressions he endured, was reduced from a considerable affluence, being once worth 5000 merks, to extreme poverty.

His son Thomas, a youth of sixteen years of age, was forced to the mountains last February, and continued a wanderer till the revolution; after which he served in Flanders under king William, and by his industry, procured as much as enabled him to live in the same place where his father had done before him.

His two sisters, Margaret and Agnes, were obliged, in the beginning of this year, to wander through Carrick, Galloway, and Nithsdale; but when there was some abatement of the severities, upon the late king's death, they ventured to Wigtoun to see some of their suffering acquaintances, particularly Margaret MacLauchlan, and were betrayed by one Patrick Stuart, who, under colour of friendship, invited them to drink with him; and, upon their modestly refusing to drink the king's health, went and informed against them, and brought a party and apprehended them. As if they had been the greatest malefactors they were put into the thieves hole, and, after some time, were removed to the same prison where the said Margaret MacLauchlan was confined.

Margaret MacLauchlan was a widow, and about 63 years of age, a woman of more than ordinary piety, prudence, and discretion, and nothing could ever be laid to her charge but non conformity, and refusing the wicked oaths then imposed. She was apprehended on the Lord's day when performing family-worship, and clapped up in prison, where she met with cruel treatment. At last she, together with Margaret and Agnes Wilson, were, about the end of April, brought to their trial before the laird of Lagg, colonel David Graham sheriff, major Windram, captain Strachan, and provost Cultrain, and were indicted, for rebellion, Bothwell-bridge, Ayrsmoss, and being present at twenty field conventicles, though it was impossible any of them could have been accessory to these risings; but the true cause was their refusing the abjuration oath; and it was very odd that it should be offered to Agnes Wilson, who was then scarce thirteen years of age; but persecutors stick at nothing. They were brought in guilty, and condemned, by those monstrous judges, to be tied to two stakes within the flood mark of the water of Bladnoch near Wigtoun, and there to be drowned. They received their sentence with much composure, and surprising cheerfulness in their countenances, accounting it their honour to suffer for Christ and his truths. Agnes the young girl got off, upon her father's giving a bond of 100l. sterling, but the other two suffered according to their sentence.

On the last of April the council had this affair under their consideration, and suspended the execution to an uncertain time, and recommended to the secretaries to procure their remission. The day to which they were reprieved is blank in the registers; but we may very safely suppose it would be for a longer day than the 11th of May, there being scarce time, between the 30th of April and that day, to get a return from the ſecretaries; but, notwithſtanding this, the barbarous ſentence was executed. Windram guarded them to the place of execution, attended by a vaſt number of ſpectators to behold ſuch an unuſual ſight. The old woman's ſtake was fixed a good way beyond the other, and ſo ſhe was firſt diſpatched, the more to terrify the other into a compliance with ſuch oaths and conditions as they required; but in vain; for ſhe adhered to her principles with unſhaken ſteadfaſtneſs. When the water was overflowing her fellow martyr, the perſecutors aſked her what ſhe thought of that ſight. She anſwered, 'What do I ſee but Chriſt and his members wreſtling there. Think you we are the ſufferers? No it is Chriſt in us; for he ſends none a warfare on their own charges.' When Margaret Wilſon was at the ſtake, ſhe ſung Pſal. xxv. from verſe 7. read the 8th chapter of the Romans, and then prayed. While at prayer the water covered her; but before ſhe was quite dead they pulled her out; and when able to ſpeak, ſhe was aſked, by Windram's orders, if ſhe would pray for the king. She anſwered, ſhe wiſhed the ſalvation of all men, and the damnation of none. One deeply affected ſaid, 'Dear Margaret, ſay, God ſave the king, ſay, God ſave the king.' She anſwered with the greateſt ſteadineſs and compoſure, 'God ſave him if he will; for it is his ſalvation I deſire.' Upon which, ſome accounts ſay, that Lagg cried, D——d b——ch, we do not want ſuch prayers; tender the oaths to her.' It is certain what ſhe ſaid did not ſatisfy; for Windram charged her inſtantly to take the abjuration, otherwiſe to return to the water. She moſt deliberately refuſed, and ſaid, 'I will not; I am one of Chriſt's children, let me go;' and immediately was thruſt into the water, where ſhe finiſhed her courſe with joy, and died a virgin martyr, aged 18 years. Upon the whole, the reader muſt ſee, that theſe two ſuffered entirely on account of their refuſing the abjuration. Reflections are needleſs.

to

On the 11th of May a young man, Andrew Hiſlop, in the pariſh of Hutton, was barbarouſly murdered. One of the wanderers happened to die at his mother's houſe, and was buried in the night time in the adjacent fields; but, the grave being diſcovered, Sir James Johnſtoun of Weſter raw came with a party, and barbarouſly dug up the body; and finding that the corpſe came out of widow Hiſlop's houſe, they pillaged and pulled the houſe down, and drove her and her children to the fields. Claverhouſe ſeized this Andrew on the 10th of May, and brought him to Weſter raw, who, to ſignalize his loyalty, would have him diſpatched in the fields, and accordingly paſſed ſentence of death upon him. Claverhouſe was backward at this time, and urged for a delay; perhaps the impreſſions of J. Brown's murder were not yet worn off, but Weſterraw preſſed it, till Claverhouſe at laſt yielded, ſaying, 'The blood of this poor man be upon you, Weſterraw; I am free of it.' Then he commanded a highland captain, who was there, to order the execution; but he, drawing his highlanders to a convenient diſtance, ſware, that her nain ſell would fight Claverhouſe and all his dragoons firſt. Whereupon he ordered three of his own men to do it. When they were ready to fire, they bid Andrew draw his cap or bonnet over his face. Being of an undaunted courage, he refuſed, and told them he could look his death-bringers in the face without fear, for he had done nothing of which he was aſhamed; and, holding up his bible, charged them to anſwer for what they had done, and were to do, at the great day, when they were to be judged by that book. He was buried where he was ſhot in Craighaugh in Eſkdale muir. This Weſter raw was was once a covenanter, and an oppoſer of the teſt, which he at laſt embraced, and became a bloody perſecutor, and died, about the revolution, in great torture of body and horror of conſcience.

On the ſaid 11th of May, major J. Balfour, Captain J. Maitland,——Menzies,——Mackenzie, apprehended three countrymen, T. Cook, J. Ure, and R. Tam, at Polmadie near Glaſgow, and then aſked the priſoners if they would pray for king James VII. They ſaid they would pray for all within the election of grace. Balfour ſaid, Do you queſtion the king's election? They anſwered, that ſometimes they queſtioned their own. In a word, they were all three ſhot within an hour after they were taken. When dead they drew off ſome of their cloaths, ſaying, they might do good to a ſoldier; but, perceiving their dogs licking their blood, they threw them on the corpſes again.

One murder more was committed on this bloody day. Lieutenant-colonel Douglas found a pious man, one Andrew MacQuhan, lying ſick of a fever, and, becauſe he was either unable, or unwilling to anſwer his queſtions, ordered him to be taken out of his bed on the 10th of May, and carried with him to the Newtoun of Galloway, and next day to be ſhot without any trial.

On the 13th of May, James Kirko, in the pariſh of Keir, was betrayed by a pretended friend, and ſeized by captain Bruce and a party of dragoons. When apprehended, the captain offered him the abjuration, and, upon his modeſt refuſal, ordered him to prepare for preſent death. Then he ſung part of the 116th pſalm, read a portion of ſcripture, and prayed. He was next offered his life on condition he would diſcover the haunts of the wanderers. He excuſed himſelf, and ſaid he durſt not redeem his life at ſo dear a rate. Whereupon they carried him to Dumfries water ſands, and upon declining to anſwer ſome more of their queſtions, ordered him immediately to be ſhot. He begged to be ſpared till next day. 'No, no,' ſaid the captain, 'no more time; the devil a peace you now get made up.' James ſaid, 'Sir, you miſtake it, you cannot mar my peace with God.' At this the captain raged, and, ſpeaking to the ſoldiers, ſaid, 'Dogs, make ready; for the devil a peace ſhall he get more.' Thus he was ſhot directly without being allowed to pray.

About this time one Matthew Donald, who had for ſome time been in priſon at Glaſgow for nonconformity, fell ſick; and, though he was in a dying condition, was ordered to be carried to Edinburgh. When they came to Calder, he could walk no further; but the ſoldiers meeting a ſledge on the road, moſt inhumanly tied him to it, and dragged him away, ſo that he died among their hands. But to leave this melancholy ſubject for a while.

On the 13th of May the parliament paſſed the act for ſupply, and ratified the forfeitures againſt Robert Hamilton of Monkland, Mr R. Baily of Jerviſwood, and the earl of Argyll; ſo that the greateſt acts of injuſtice and cruelty were now ratified. The ſame day they paſſed the act for taking the teſt, by which all proteſtant heritors, liferentors, &c. were to ſwear this oath by a certain time fixed in the act, except women. The only remark that needs be made here is, that the teſt ſeems now to be limited to proteſtants. The reader may eaſily gueſs the reaſon of this, when he remembers what the king, when duke of York, had threatened, p. 136. In the afternoon they made an act concerning juſtices of peace, who by this were to be nominated by the council, to have power of proceeding againſt church-irregularities, and a right to the fines of all delinquents except heritors. This was brave encouragement to go on in the work of perſecution.

On the 15th the proceſs againſt the noblemen and gentlemen, mentioned p. 291. came on before the parliament. The late alledged conſpiracy was the pretence; but their oppoſition to prelacy was the real cauſe. There were preſent Sir William Scot, Ceſnock elder and younger, Hay of Park, John Weir of Newtoun. The reſt named in the citation were abſent. The king's letter, the advocate's orders to proſecute, the general indictment, were all read, together with a libel or indictment againſt Harden younger, and two additional libels againſt Hay of Park and Ardkinglaſs; but theſe things, with other preliminaries, I omit.

On the 17th the council wrote to the duke of Gordon, and others in the northern ſhires, ordering them to call forth the heritors, ſince Argyll was now appearing about the weſtern iſlands. The ſame day they commanded Mr Blackadder and Mr William Spence to be brought to Edinburgh; and, on the 19th, all the heritors on the ſouth ſide of Tay were enjoined to attend the king's hoſt, and lord Neil Campbell, William Cochran younger of Ochiltree, the maſter of Melvil, and Pringle younger of Torwoodlee, were ordered to enter into the caſtle of Edinburgh.

It is not to be imagined what ravages the ſoldiers made upon the news of Argyll's landing. Parties continually marched through the ſouth and weſt, and all nonconformiſts were ſure to feel the effects of their fury.

One James Forſyth, in the pariſh of Lochmaben, was ſeized and ſent priſoner to Weſter-raw, who offered to let him go, if, with uplifted hands, he would ſwear, and ſay, 'God bleſs king James VII.' Forſyth aſked him what he meant by bleſſing the king? For his part, he wiſhed him well, and that all ſpiritual bleſſings might be upon him. The other replied, he ſhould own him as his lawful king, and that he ſhould pray long may he live, and well may he proſper in all his actings and proceedings. James told him he could not do that, becauſe he was a papiſt and a perſecutor. He was next examined by Claverhouſe; but they were reſtrained from touching his life; however, they ſent him priſoner to Edinburgh, and from thence to Burntiſland. His wife, having come to ſee him, was ſent priſoner, with him, though ſhe was big with child, and they had nothing to lay to her charge. They were both ſent to Dunnotter, where ſhe was delivered, and died. And this brings me to give a brief account of the peculiar hardſhips the priſoners met with who were ſent thither. My author had this tragical account from the papers of the reverend Mr John Frazer, and the diſtinct narratives of the forementioned Quintin Dick and Mr William Mac Millan, who were among theſe unhappy priſoners.

Mr Fraſer had gone to London, for his ſafety and improvement, about the end of 1678, or beginning of 1679, and continued there till the end of 1684, when he was, with ſeveral other Scotſmen, ſeized at a diſſenting meeting in Gutterlane near Guildhall, as Mr A. Shields was preaching.

The accounts of Argyll's invaſion alarmed the Scots miniſtry ſo, that, in conſequence of a haſty reſolution Mr John Frazer, Mr William MacMillan Quintin Dick, William Niven, William Campbell of Middlewellwood, his brother John, and many others in the priſons of Edinburgh and the Canongate, were, on the 18th of May, to their great ſurprize, taken out of their reſpective priſons, without knowing what was to be done with them, and carried out of town, under a ſtrong guard, and delivered at the Netherbow, to Douglas's regiment, by whom they were conducted to Leith. From thence, being in all above 200, they were put into open boats, and hurried off the ſhore, without being permitted to receive any neceſſaries from their friends or relations, who never expected to ſee them more. Next morning about break of day, they landed at Burntiſland.

About 240 were there crouded into two rooms, in the priſon, where they continued for two days and two nights, were denied liberty ſeparately to eaſe nature, had nothing allowed for their ſubſiſtence, and many of them were not permitted to have bread and water for their money. When thus pent up the laird of Gosford came from the council with orders to bring back to Edinburgh as many as would immediately ſwear the oath of alledgiance and ſupremacy. About 40 complied; the reſt, owning their alledgiance, but refuſing the ſupremacy, were reſerved for further miſeries.

It would be tedious to mention all their particular hardſhips on the road. After two days diſmal confinement at Burntiſland, men and women together, they were committed to the militia of Fife. Moſt of them had their hands tied behind them. They who were ſo humane as to bring any neceſſaries for their ſupport, were beat off by the guard. Lieutenant Beton of Kilrinnie was ſo cruel as to beat ſome of the old women among them, and otherwiſe abuſe them, becauſe they could not walk ſo faſt as they would have them. In their journey, when thruſt into houſes and priſons, they were ſo crouded that they were almoſt ſuffocated, and ſeveral of the women fainted.

Among other miſerable ſufferers, was one Eupham Threpland, the wife of George MacBirnie merchant in Dumfries, who, from her huſband's death 1681, underwent a ſcene of trouble. When the reſt of the priſoners, juſt now mentioned, were delivered to the guard, a corporal came and told her, that ſhe muſt likewiſe go with them. Remonſtrances were in vain; for though ſhe was unable to travel, that was not admitted as any excuſe; they placed her behind one of the dragoons, and hurried her after them, without ſuffering her to take any refreſhment; and thus ſhe joined the reſt of her fellow-ſufferers at Burntiſland.

At laſt on the Lord's day, 24th of May, they were all, except a few that made their eſcape on the road, brought to Dunotter caſtle, and received by George Keith of Whiteridge, ſheriff depute of Mearns. This large company was thruſt into a dark vault, under ground, which had but one ſmall window towards the ſea. It was full of mire ancle deep. In this dreadful place about 100 of them were pent up almoſt the whole of this ſummer, without air, without eaſe, without room either to lie or walk, and without any comfort except what they had from heaven. They were obliged to purchaſe the worſt of proviſions at an extravagant rate. They were ſo ſuffocated with the ſmell of the place, and of their own excrements, that, as ſeverals of them died, ſo it was a wonder of mercy any ſurvived ſuch an unparallelled calamity. When they had all continued together in the great vault, the governor was pleaſed to remove about 40 of the men to another ſmall vault, without any light but what came in through a ſmall crevice. The governor's lady came to ſee the priſoners, and prevailed with her huſband to remove 12 of the men from the 40, and the women from the large vault, into two rooms, which was a great relief.

The intollerable hardſhips theſe poor people endured, put ſome of them to attempt their eſcape; accordingly about 25 of them got out one night by the window towards the ſea, and crept along a dangerous rock, to the utmoſt hazard of their lives; but the alarm being ſoon given 15 of them were retaken, and moſt unhumanly beat and bruiſed; and, when brought back to priſon, were put into the guard houſe, bound and laid on their back on the floors and moſt dreadfully tormented. William Niven, Peter Ruſſel, and Alexander Dalglieſh in Kilbride were laid on their backs on a form, their hands were tied to the foot of it, and a fiery match put between every finger of both hands, and ſix ſoldiers waited by turns to blow the match, and keep it equal with their fingers. This was continued for three hours, without intermiſſion, by the governor's order. W. Niven loſt one of the fingers of his left hand. Alexander Dalglieſh, and one more, died of the torture: and ſeveral others had their fingers burnt, and the very bone turned to aſhes.

Such were their hardſhips, that Grizel Cairns and Aliſon Johnſtoun, in behalf of Mr William MacMillan, and Robert Young wright in Edinburgh, their huſbands, and the reſt of their fellow priſoners, preſented a petition to the council, repreſenting their intolerable grievances, and praying for redreſs. The council on the 8th of June took their petition under conſideration, and ordered the deputy governor to ſuffer meat, drink, and other neceſſaries, to be brought to the priſoners, by their friends or ſervants, at the ordinary eaſy rates, and to allow Mr MacMillan and Robert Young a diſtant room from the reſt, and all the priſoners to have better accomodation. This ſo nettled the governor, that he drew up a declaration in his own favour, obliging the ſubſcribers to teſtify that they had good uſage, and wanted not conveniencies ſince they came to Dunotter; but there were very few that ſigned this, the reſt abſolutely refuſing to atteſt a falſhood. After this in July, the earls of Errol and Kintore, were appointed to examine the Dunotter priſoners, whether they owned the king, and would ſubmit to his authority; whether they would pray for him, and renounce the apologetical declaration. At laſt the priſoners were brought ſouth: the conſequences of which ſhall be related in its proper place. William Campbell of Middlewellwood, with difficulty eſcaped baniſhment, and came home; but next year was apprehended, and put in priſon in the Canongate, from whence he was, after a long impriſonment, releaſed upon paying 1200 merks fine.

On the 22d of May the indictment was read in parliament againſt Sir John Cochran, Polwart, Torwoodlee, and the heirs of Mr Martin. Sir John's Trial came on in the forenoon. All that appeared againſt him was, that he had converſed with others about proper methods for preventing the ruin of the nation. Mr Carſtairs's printed declaration, contrary to former promiſes, was read. In ſhort, he was brought in guilty, and condemned, as in the ſentence againſt Jerviſwood. And in the afternoon the ſame ſentence was pronounced againſt the reſt.

The ſame day the parliament paſſed the act for taking the oath of allegiance, whereby they ratified all that the council, the juſticiary, and their commiſſioners had done, in baniſhing, impriſoning, and fining the refuſers of the ſaid oath, &c. The reader has ſeen how much innocent blood was ſhed on this ſcore, and muſt judge whether by this act, the parliament did not bring the guilt of it upon themſelves.

Mr Renwick, who ſtill preached in the fields, having, on the ſaid 22d of May, preached to a conſiderable number of his followers, and received ſeveral into the ſocieties who profeſſed their repentance for taking the abjuration and the teſt, &c. The council, on the 25th, ordered lord Carmichael to call all ſuſpected perſons to an account, and to take care of the country of Carrick, by ſecuring the arms and horſes of all ſuſpected perſons, the better to prevent the deſigns of Argyll.

On the 27th the indictment was read againſt Sir Thomas Stuart of Coltneſs, for ſending meat and drink to the people at Bothwell, his receiving men that came from thence; and, being found guilty, was ſentenced to die. His caſe was much the ſame with Blackwood's, p. 176.

Though the followers of Mr Renwick were not free to join the earl of Argyll, on account, as they ſaid, of the too promiſcuous admiſſion of perſons of truſt in that party; and becauſe they could not eſpouſe his declaration, as the ſtate of their quarrel being, as they apprehended, not concerted according to the conſtant plea of the Scots covenanters, yet againſt the uſurpation of a bloody papiſt, they publiſhed another declaration at Sanquhar, on the 28th of May, of which I cannot but give the following abſtract.

IT hath pleaſed the holy and wiſe God to exerciſe the church of Scotland, now of a long time, with wreſtling and warfaring under the yoke of cruel oppreſſions. ——All this——we have met with, as juſt upon the Lord's part, though unjuſt upon man's, for our manifold ſins and iniquities; and, in a ſpecial manner, for our not purging our judicatories and armies, when the power was in our hands, of men diſaffected to the cauſe and intereſt of Chriſt,——and for inordinate affection to, and luſting after the deceaſed tyrant Charles II. and advancing him to the legal throne, even while known, by many palpable diſcoveries,——to retain his heart-enmity at the covenanted work of reformation. —— And howbeit,—when we were brought to a very ſmall remnant, we did, by open declarations, diſclaim his pretended authority; ——all which we do hereby truly approve.

So now the Lord—having removed the foreſaid Charles by death, and a few wicked and unprincipled men having —proclaimed James duke of york, though a profeſſed papiſt, and excommunicate perſon—to be king of Scotland; &c. we the contending and ſuffering remnant of the true preſbyterians of the church of Scotland—do here delib rately, jointly, and unanimouſly, proteſt againſt the foreſaid proclamation.—in regard that it is chuſing a magiſtrate to be a governor, who hath ſhed the blood of the ſaints;— the height of confederacy with an idolater, which is forbidden by the law of God,—contrary to the declaration of the aſſembly 27th July 1649, and to many wholeſome and laudable acts of parliament,— and inconſiſtent with the ſafety, faith, conſcience, and Chriſtian liberty of a Chriſtian people, to chuſe a ſubject of antichriſt to be their—ſupreme magiſtrate; for it could not but be both highly ſinful and irrational for us to intruſt an enemy to the work and people of God, with the intereſts of both.

Alſo conceiving that this pretended parliament is not a lawful parliament, in regard that the election of commiſſioners is limited,—that the members are convicted of avowed perjury,—are men of blood, the chief being convict of avowed murder.——We do, in like manner, upon theſe and many other imporant grounds and reaſons, proteſt againſt the validity and conſtitution of this preſent parliament,—and their proceeding to any approbation or ratification of the foreſaid proclamation.——

And further, ſeeing bloody papiſts, the ſubjects of antichriſt, are become ſo hopeful, bold and confident, under the perfidy of the ſaid James duke of York, and popery itſelf—like to be intruded again—upon theſe covenanted lands, and an open door being made thereunto by its accurſed and abjured harbinger prelacy, which theſe three kingdoms are equally ſworn againſt; we do, in like manner, proteſt againſt all kinds of popery, in general and particular heads,—abjured moſt explicitely by our national covenant, abrogated, annulled, and reſcinded by our acts of parliament, and againſt its entering again into this land, and againſt every thing that doth or may, directly or indirectly, make way for the ſame, diſclaiming likewiſe all ſectarianiſm, malignancy, and any confederacy therewith.

Moreover taking into our ſerious conſideration the low — ſtate of the churches of England and Ireland,—all bound in one covenant and ſolemn league together, we (in the bowels of Chriſt) do, in like manner, admoniſh you our brethren,—that ye remember how far you have ſadly failed in purſuing the ends of our covenants, &c.

Finally, we being miſrepreſented to many,—as perſons of murdering and aſſaſſinating principles, all which principles and practices we do hereby declare, before God, angels, and men, that we abhor, renounce, and deteſt; as alſo all manner of robbing of any, whether open enemies or others,—and all unwarrantable practices committed by any few perſons reputed to be of us,—as the unwarrantable manner of killing the curate of Carſphairn——.

This then is the ſubſtance of their declaration againſt popery, when open attempts were made for its introduction; and though it was not ſo much condemned, as any of their former declarations, yet they had not the concurrence of any miniſters and profeſſors; and, which is ſurpriſing, it was never a ground of perſecution from the managers, particularly and expreſſly declared. though as Mr Shields obſerves, 'For its matter, it was conſpicuouſly conſonant, not only to the old principles, but even to the common grounds of Argyll's declaration of war againſt this uſurper, then generally eſpouſed by preſbyterians.' But to proceed.

On the 2d of June the parliament, approved and confirmed the opinion of the lords of council and ſeſſion, November 1684, making thoſe guilty of high treaſon who ſhould own, or refuſe to diſown, the ſocieties apologetical declaration, in ſo far as it declares, &c. and all the proceſſes that had been or ſhould be on that ſcore. It would ſeem one chief part of the buſineſs of this parliament was to ratify the former proceedings of the miniſtry; but it does not appear that they approved of the orders given for killing in the fields, that being too large a pill to be ſwallowed, even by ſuch a parliament as this.

Another act paſſed this day was that for regularity; by which it was ordained, that all maſters, whether heritors, liferenters, ſhould inſert, in all tacks to their tenants, an expreſs clauſe, whereby the tenant ſhall oblige himſelf, that he, and his family, cottagers and ſervants, ſhall live peaceably and regularly, free of all fanatical diſorders, under the penalty of loſing the half of their moveables, each for their own fault, ſo that, by this act, all preſbyterians were excluded from having any leaſes.

Their next act this day ratified the act and proclamation of council for raiſing the hue and cry; by another act paſſed this day (for I omit that about adjudications for fines, becauſe I do not underſtand it) was for ſecuring the kingdom, by which every maſter of a ſhip was obliged to bring all his paſſengers, at their arrival, before the next magiſtrate, to give an account of themſelves; and the ſame muſt be done when perſons go out of the kingdom, under the penalty of ſuch fines and corporal puniſhment, on the maſter of the ſhip, as the council ſhall think fit. There were ſome other acts paſſed this day which I omit.

On the 28th of June they made a very ſtrange act for ſecuring the preſent council, the ſecret committee, the judges and officers of the army, and all other commiſſioners miſſioners, as follows: 'Our ſovereign lord, conſidering the great and acceptable ſervices done to his majeſty by theſe juſt now mentioned, and being deſirous to ſecure them for their actings and omiſſions——doth, with advice and conſent of his eſtates of parliament, indemnity and ſecure all and every one of them—againſt all purſuits or complaints that can be raiſed againſt them, any manner of way, for their actings in his majeſty's ſervice, as likewiſe for their omiſſions—and that as fully as if every particular crime or miſdemeanour were particularly ſpecified in a remiſſion under his majeſty's great ſeal,' &c.

How powerful are the ſtings of an evil conſcience! Had not the managers been conſcious of unprecedented proceedings, it is hardly to be imagined they would have procured ſuch an act as this, which is a ſtanding blot on their memoirs in the records of the nation. Had they acted agreeable to the laws of God and man, or had their conſciouſneſs of guilt excited them to ſeek pardon from the almighty, for the innocent blood in their ſkirts, why a parliamentary indemnity? But it is to be feared, the pardon granted by a wicked parliament will ſtand them in ſmall ſtead, when they ſhall appear before that judge from whoſe ſentence there can be no appeal.

The ſame day Mr Robert Fergu ſon was tried in abſence, found guilty, and condemned, upon the declaration of Weſt and Burn. My author obſerves, that, if there was any formed deſign againſt the king and the duke, he was privy to it; but none of the reſt were any ways acceſſory.

On the 6th Claverhouſe, with a party, apprehended multitudes, and forced many of them to ſwear never to take arms againſt king James VII. on pretence of religion, and carried ſuch as refuſed about with them priſoners, binding them by two's and three's.

On the 10th lord Annandale and his party ſeized David Halliday in Glencyre, and George Short, and gave them quarters till next day; but when Lagg came up, he inſiſted upon having them preſently diſpatched; neither the intreaties of the poor men, nor the declaration of lord Annandale that he had promiſed them life till next day, could prevail: for they were ſhot by Lagg's orders; juſt as they lay fettered on the ground, and their bodies continued in their gore till next day.

The ſame month Gilbert Mac Adam, ſon-in law of James Dun, having been baniſhed for his nonconformity, and purchaſed his freedom, returned home; but meeting with ſome friends for prayer at a houſe near Kirkmichael, a company of militia, under the command of Colzean, ſurrounded the houſe. Gilbert being moſt obnoxious, tried to eſcape; but the ſoldiers perceiving him, diſcharged their pieces and killed him on the ſpot.

About the middle of this month, as James Brown in the pariſh of Coulter was fiſhing, Claverhouſe apprehended him, and, had it not been for the laird Coulterallers, would have ſhot him preſently; but he was carried to the Engliſh border, and from thence to the priſon at Selkirk, out of which he happily made his eſcape.

There were ſeveral other murders in the fields, of which I have not their dates, as that of William Johnſton gardener to the laird of Fintilloch, George Walker ſervant in Kirkauly, and John Milroy chapman, who were apprehended by major Windram, who, after aſking ſome queſtions, ordered them all to be hanged at Wigtoun the day after they were ſeized. A party of ſoldiers overtook Joſeph Wilſon, John and Alexander Jamieſon, and John Humphry at Knocdon hill, as they were coming from hearing Mr Renwick, and ſhot them all except Alexander Jamieſon. The ſame day a party of dragoons took Simon Paterſon and David Dun, and, without any trial, hanged them at Cumnock. Peter Inglis cornet, ſon to Peter Inglis, with ſome ſoldiers, decoyed Thomas Richard of Muir-kirk, an old man of 80 years of age, into a confeſſion that he had entertained ſome of the wanderers, and then delivered the good old man to colonel Douglaſs, who, without any jury or trial, ordered him to be executed at Cumnock next day, notwithſtanding the interceſſion of ſome ladies of the epiſcopal perſuaſion. One William Paterſon, ſon to Robert Paterſon in the pariſh of Cambuſnethen, was ſhot, without any trial, by order of captain Bell. This good man had endured a great deal of trouble during the former years; but now his troubles were brought to a period. The reader cannot but make proper reflections on ſo many murders, and judge who they were that truly deſerved to be called murderers and aſſaſſins.

On the 11th of June the parliament paſſed an act, which they called, An addreſs againſt the arch-traitor Archibald Campbell ſometime earl of Argyll wherein they beg that the earl's family, the heritors, ring-leaders, and preachers that joined him, ſhould be for ever declared incapable of mercy, and of bearing any honours or eſtate in the kingdom, and that all ſubjects be diſcharged from interceeding for them any manner of way. I ſhall not trouble the reader with remarks on this, it being ſo very agreeable to the principle of rooting out of heretics; only I muſt obſerve that the clauſe relating to the interceſſion of the ſubjects was reverſed in the next ſeſſion.

Next day James Napier, Allan Atkin, and John Pierſon who had been condemned by colonel Douglas at Cumnock, for not diſcovering the rebels, were pardoned.

On the 13th lord Melvil, Montgomery of Langſhaw, and the two Ceſnocks, were ſeparately tried, and all found guilty of acceſſion to the plot. Mr Carſtairs's depoſitions, contrary to the public faith, were read againſt them. Sentence was paſſed againſt the firſt two, as in the other caſes; but the time and place of the execution of Ceſnock elder and younger were referred to the king. Though the Ceſnocks were afterwards pardoned and releaſed yet by peremptory orders from the king an expreſs was diſpatched by lieutenant colonel Murray for apprehending them, and conducting them to the Bass. The old gentleman died ſoon after, and probably his death was haſtened by the hardſhips he underwent.

The ſame day they paſſed an act for the clergy by which all the acts, eſpecially thoſe made in the former reign, in their favour, were ratified, and all murderers and aſſaſſins of biſhops and miniſters were ordered to be puniſhed, which was reaſonable, and the pariſhioners, where any attempt ſhould be made, were to pay ſuch ſums to their widows as the council ſhould ſee proper; but this was a puniſhing the innocent with the guilty. In a word, this act made an attempt to break or rob the houſes of the clergy to be death to the invader. My author juſtly obſerves, that a becoming miniſterial carriage is a better hedge than 20 ſuch ſevere laws, and that before the reſtoration, and ſince the revolution, preſbyterian miniſters required no ſuch acts in their favour. He farther obſerves that this act was no bar in the way of the projected deſign of introducing popery, to which in Scotland, prelacy ſtill led the way.

By the 5th act of this parliament, the lands of Sir John Cochran of Ochiltree, Sir Patrick Hume of Polwart, Thomas Stuart of Coltneſs, Pringle of Torwoodlee, George late earl of Melvil, David Montgomery of Langſhaw, Ceſnock elder and younger, Mr Robert Martin earl of Tarras, Mr Robert Baily of Jerviſwood, Thomas Kennedy of Grange, John Porterfield of Douchal, Mr William and Alexander Gordons of Earlſtoun, James Gordon younger of Craighen, were for ever annexed to the crown; but this, with other unjuſt and oppreſſive acts, was reverſed after the revolution.

On the ſame 13th of June two regiments of ſoldiers came into New-Galloway, and, ſeparating into two different places, quite ravaged the country; nay, about this time the whole army came to the weſt country, and committed innumerable abuſes every where; ſo that the loſſes ſuſtained by many, eſpecially about the ſmall village of Dameliingtoun, are not to be calculated. The lands of lord Stair and Ceſnock were entirely plundered. But I muſt paſs theſe things.

On the 16th the parliament referred the reſt of the priſoners, that were to have been tried by them, to the juſticiary, with power to the lords to proceed againſt them as if they had been ſummoned before them; accordingly their proceſs came on next month. The ſame day the parliament annexed the offices belonging to the earl of Argyll to the crown, and was adjourned to the laſt Tueſday of October, and afterwards to April next year. Mr Rapin juſtly obſerves, when mentioning ſome of the acts of this ſeſſion, that, if what paſſed in Scotland in the reign of king Charles I. and during the interregnum, be remembered, this was not the ſenſe of the Scots, but only the opinion of a parliament devoted to the king, and which viſibly abuſed their authority, to eſtabliſh a form of government directly contrary to the old conſtitution; but I ſhall leave the reader to make his own reflections on this ſeſſion of parliament, and conclude this chapter with the farther proceedings of the earl of Argyll, till he fell into the hands of his enemies.

We left his lordſhip at Tarbet, where he publiſhed his declaration to his clan. There he was joined with 1000 men, under Sir Duncan Campbell; and, having modelled his little army into three regiments, each conſiſting of not much above 500 men, he determined to have attacked Ballechan who had not above 600 men with him; but Sir John Cochran, and others with him, would not go in with this propoſal. A council of war was called, where it was reſolved, contrary to the earl's ſentiments, to invade the low-lands.

In conſequence of this the forces were tranſported, the beſt way they could, to Cowal in Argyll-ſhire; and Sir John Cochran, colonel Elphingſtoun and major Fullerton were ſent from thence to the lowlands: but by this time the coaſts were guarded, and ſome Engliſh frigates were come up; ſo that Sir John, not being able to land in the Largs in Ayrſhire, was forced to put in about Greenock, in order to have intelligence and ſubſiſtance for their men. Upon their landing they put to flight ſome of the militia; then Sir John entered the town of Greenock, and endeavoured to prevail with the inhabitants to join in defence of religion and liberty. He ſeized only about 40 bolls of meal, inſtead of 200, which Argyll had ordered him to bring for the uſe of the army, and then, upon a falſe alarm, retired in the night, and ſailed back to Cowal, and there, when it was too late, declared that it was folly to attempt the Lowlands as yet, ſince they were every where well guarded by ſoldiers and the militia.

Upon this Argyll renewed his deſign upon Inverary; and for this end divided his ſmall army, and gave the one half of it to Colonel Rumbold, whom he ſent to guard a paſs againſt the marquis of Athol, and raiſe the country as much as he could. He took the other half with himſelf to Inverary, but the wind being contrary for ſeveral days, and the Engliſh frigates come up, he was obliged to ſhelter his veſſels under the caſtle of Allangreg, which having fortified as well as he could, and left two companies to guard it, he then marched by land to Inverary, reſolving to attack the Marquis of Athol, Col. Rumbold, in the mean time, marched with about 500 men, and ſeized the caſtle of Ardkinglaſs. The Marquis of Athol ſent off a large fiſhing-boat, full of men, to know the Colonel's ſtrength: but, cap. Duncanſon, manning a fiſhing-veſſel, chaſed the other within piſtol-ſhot of the town. However, ſome regiments were ordered from Inverary to retake the caſtle of Ardinglaſs: but Argyll by this time was got up with Rumbold. The enemy made a halt; upon which the earl with five companies of foot, and two troops of horſe, went to attack them, and, after putting the firſt body of them to flight, returned to the caſtle of Ardkinglaſs, reſolved, next day, to attack Inverary, notwithſtanding the marquis of Athole was four times his number: but ſome of the gentlemen who were with his lordſhip, and had all along differed from him, threatened to quit all, and go to the Lowlands; ſo that he was obliged to leave the caſtle of Allangreg, with three companies of foot commanded by the laird of Lapneſs, and to order the reſt, under Rumbold and Sir Duncan Campbell, to met him at the church of Glenderule, which they did.

Two days after this, the garriſon left in Allingreg, being, as they ſaid, deſtitute of proviſions, abandoned that caſtle. The priſoners taken at Orkney, being left behind, acquainted the captains of the Engliſh frigates whenever they came aſhore, ſo that all fell into their hands. This diſaſter obliged Argyll to march into the lowlands, under a thouſand diſadvantages; for when he croſſed the water of Leven, a little above Dumbartoun, he found all the king's army and militia ready to oppoſe him, commanded by the earl of Dumbartoun.

The earl and Alyoffe were for engaging, knowing that, though they were thrice their number, yet they had many friends among them: but his lordſhip was again over-ruled, and a retreat was reſolved on. Accordingly, at night, they marched off, leaving great fires in their former camp: but their leaders miſtaking their way, led them into a moſs, which quite diſordered them; ſo that, though they were a good army at night, there were not 500 of them together in the morning. Rumbold and many brave men loſt their way. They who kept together came to Kilpatrick, and put a company of militia to flight. Sir John Cochran, Sir Patrick Hume, and others, croſſed the Clyde. At length a ſkirmiſh happened at Muirdyke in Lochwinnoch, in which capt. Clelland and ſome others were killed, and ſeveral wounded. On Sir John's ſide a gentleman of the name of Campbell was killed, major Henderſon and Mr Archer were wounded. The laſt of theſe was carried into a ſhepherd's houſe, where the enemy found him, and brought him to Edinburgh. After this they diſperſed, and ſhifted for themſelves the beſt way they could.

The earl, in the mean time, according to his own account, finding it impracticable either to rally his friends, or return to Argyllſhire, attempted to diſguiſe himſelf under the appearance of a countryman: but he fell from one difficulty to another till he was attacked at the water of Inchinan, on the 17th of June, by two of the militia, who laid hold of him, one on each ſide, all on horſe-back. He grappled with both, and one of them with the earl went to the ground. His lordſhip got up and rid himſelf of them both, by preſenting his pocket-piſtols, and would have made his eſcape, had not five more come and knocked him down with their ſwords. When they knew who he was, they ſeemed to be much concerned; but durſt not let him go. He was then brought in priſoner to the earl of Dumbartoun at Glaſgow; and thus this noble peer was once more in the hands of his enemies. Upon the whole, we may ſee the miſchief of diviſions: for, had not his lordſhip, and thoſe gentlemen embarked in the ſame cauſe, differed in their ſentiments, it is probable they would have been more ſucceſsful. Biſhop Burnet lays the chief blame on Argyll, and others on Sir John Cochran, and thoſe that adhered to him: but it is not unlikely there were faults on all ſides. There were ſeveral taken as well as Argyll, the chief of whom were Sir John Cochran, Rumbold, Ayloffe, and the above mentioned Thomas Archer, Gavin Ruſſel, and David Law; all theſe, except Sir John Cochran and Ayloffe, were executed at Edinburgh. Above twenty who were taken in the Highlands, were hanged at Inverary; and great numbers were baniſhed to America. But I muſt now proceed to

CHAP. XIII.

Of the execution of the earl of Argyll, Rumbold, Mr Thomas Archer, and others: the proceedings of the council and juſticiary; the ſufferings of the baniſhed and other branches of the oppreſſion to the end of the year.

WHen the earl of Argyll was apprehended, he was firſt brought to the town of Renfrew, and while refreſhing himſelf there, he ſaid to Thomas Crawford of Crawford's burn, to whom he had given a ſilver ſnuff-box in token of his reſpect, 'Thomas, it hath pleaſed providence to frown on my attempt; but remember, I tell you, ere long, ONE ſhall take up this quarrel, whoſe ſhoes I am not worthy to carry, who will not miſcarry in his undertrking.' From Renfrew his lordſhip was taken to Glaſgow, and from thence to Edinburgh, under a ſtrong guard; and, according to the order of council dated June 20, was carried up the ſtreet, with his hands tied behind his back, bare-headed, in the midſt of Captain Graham's guards; the hangman went before him, the horſe guards before and behind: and thus his Lordſhip was conducted, in diſmal proceſſion, to the caſtle and there laid in irons.

There was a great debate at Edinburgh, whether to bring him to a trial for his preſent attempt, or to execute him on the ſentence pronounced againſt him 1681; but ſuch was the zeal of the preſent managers, that they would not ſeem to call the juſtice of their former ſentence in queſtion, though, by the way, all the world muſt look upon it as the moſt unrighteous ſentence that could be paſſed; and therefore they looked upon him as already condemned. They were at great pains to bring him to ſuch a confeſſion as might involve others, frequently viſited him, brought him ſeveral times before their committees, threatned him with torture, and put many queſtions to him; thus matters ſtood with him, till an expreſs came from court for his execution.

Mean while Col. Rumbold was taken, and, on the 22d of June, was ordered, by the council, to be conducted to the caſtle in a cart, with a rope about his neck, fettered and bare-headed. The hangman's man led the cart. Col. Graham attended with the guard, with drums beating and colours flying, and next day the advocate was ordered to proſecute him before the juſticiary.

On the 24th the council iſſued a proclamation for apprehending thoſe concerned with the earl of Argyll, which I ſhall not here inſert. It is eaſy for the reader to conceive the ſtrain of it. Only I cannot but obſerve, that it was ſomething ſtrange to publiſh to the world, in this proclamation, that col. Ayloff endeavoured to kill himſelf; for what was that to the caſe in hand? My author ſays, that the fact was very much queſtioned by perſons of good ſenſe who lived at that time; but, if it was true, it had no relation to Argyll's attempt; only the managers were willing to improve every circumſtance. Biſhop Burnet tells us, 'That great diſcoveries being expected from him, he was brought to London, where the king examined him in perſon; but could draw nothing from him but one ſevere repartee. Being ſullen, and refuſing to diſcover any thing, the king ſaid to him, Mr Ayloffe, you know it is in my power to pardon you, therefore ſay that which may deſerve it. Ayloffe, it is ſaid, replied, That though it be in your power, yet it is not in your nature to pardon. Mr Ayloffe was nearly related to the king's children, being nephew to the old earl of Clarendon by marriage; for Ayloffe's aunt was his firſt wife; ſo that, had the conſideration of this moved the king to pardon him, that, ſays the hiſtorian, would have been an effectual confutation of his bold rapartee: but he ſuffered as well as others.'

On the 25th the council ordered colonel Rumbold to be executed in the following manner; that, on the morrow, on his being found guilty by the lords of juſticiary, he be taken from their bar to the low council houſe, and from thence to be led down by the hangman, with his hat on, to the ſcaffold, and there to be drawn up the gibbet with a rope about his neck, and immediately to be let down, his heart to be cut out by the hangman, and ſhewn to the people on the point of a bayonet or dagger, ſaying, Here is the heart of a bloody traitor and murderer,' and then to be thrown into a fire prepared on purpoſe on the ſcaffold; after that his head to be cut off, and ſhewn to the people in the ſame manner; and then his body to be quartered, one part of it to be affixed at the port or tolbooth of Glaſgow, another at Jedburgh, a third at Dumfries, the fourth at the Newtoun of Galloway, and his head on a high pole at the Weſt port of Edinburgh. He bore the baſe inſults of the council with much compoſure, owned the crime he appeared for, and expreſſed his joy in his ſufferings; whereupon one of them called him a confounded villain. He replied with the utmoſt ſedateneſs, 'I am at peace with God through Jeſus Chriſt, to men I have done no wrong, what then can confound me?'

On the 26th he was arraigned before the juſticiary, brought in guilty, condemned and executed. He was ſo weak, when brought to the ſcaffold, that, not being able to walk alone, he was ſupported by two officers. When, in his laſt ſpeech, he bleſſed God that it was for no ill account, but for owning and adhering to his diſtreſſed work and intereſt, that ſuch a lot was carved out for him, the drums beat; at which he ſhook his head, and ſaid, 'Will they not ſuffer a dying man to ſpeak his laſt words to the people?' And then went on, declaring his confidence in the righteouſneſs of the cauſe he was engaged in, and, among other things, ſaid, 'I confeſs enemies think they have got their foot on the neck of the proteſtant intereſt now; but I am perſuaded it is as true as I am this day entering into eternity, that Chriſt ſhall be glorious in theſe lands, and even in poor Scotland, and that ſhortly; and it is like many who ſee me die this day may be witneſſes thereof; yea, he ſhall govern theſe nations with a rod of iron, and that to the terror of his enemies.' After this he prayed, and, when praying for the extirpation of popery, prelacy, and other ſuperſtitions, the drums beat again. He forgave the executioner and all men, and, when he had again prayed within himſelf, he gave the ſignal, and was executed according to the ſentence.

Thus fell Richard Rumbold. 'This was the perſon who dwelt in Rye houſe, where it was pretended the plot was laid for murdering the late and preſent king. He denied the truth of that conſpiracy. He owned he thought the prince was as much tied to the people, as the people were to the prince; and that, when the king departed from the legal meaſures of government, the people had a right to aſſert their liberties, and to reſtrain him. He did not deny but that he had heard many propoſitions at Weſt's chambers, about killing the two brothers; and upon that he had ſaid, it could have been eaſily executed near his houſe; upon which ſome diſcourſe had followed how it might have been managed; but he ſaid, it was only talk, and that nothing was either laid, or ſo much as reſolved on.' He farther ſaid. 'He did not believe that God had made the greater part of mankind with ſaddles on their backs, and bridles in their mouths, and ſome few booted and ſpurred to ride the reſt.' But to return to Argyll.

His lordſhip's carriage, before his execution, was both pious and edifying. While he was abroad, after his eſcape, he ſhewed himſelf to be a nobleman of ſingular piety, his afflictions being of great ſervice to him. He ſpent the 28th of June, which was the ſabbath before his death, in a moſt becoming way. The manner in which he took his leave of his ſiſter, the lady of Lothian, was very moving. While in the caſtle he had theſe remarkable expreſſions in converſation with a dear friend. 'My groſs compliances are now ſad and grievous to me: for theſe the Lord would not honour me to be inſtrumental in his work; but I deſire to die in the faith of a deliverance to his church and people; and though I will not take upon me to be a prophet, yet, having ſtrong impreſſions thereof upon my ſpirit, I doubt not but her deliverance will come very ſuddenly, and I hope I ſhall be well. It is true, my family is low, and I have nothing to leave them; but if they ſeek God they will be wonderfully ſeen to and provided for: and if they do not, I care not what come of them. I fear ſome have eyed me too much as an inſtrument. Lean not to the arm of fleſh.

On the 29th a letter from the king was read in council, ordering them to bring the earl to condign puniſhment within the ſpace of three days after the receipt of it, and, in the mean time, to bring him to a confeſſion of his aſſociates and correſpondents, &c. In conſequence of this his lordſhip was ordered to be beheaded next day, and his head to be affixed on the tolbooth of Edinburgh on an high pin of iron. Accordingly on Tueſday, June the 30th, Argyll was executed. This day he wrote and ordered others to write ſeveral letters to his friends, particularly to madam Smith, to his excellent lady, and others, which the reader may ſee in my author. He declared, in the morning, to a friend, that he had more joy and comfort this day, than the day after he eſcaped out of the caſtle.

His lordſhip dined with a grave and becoming chearfulneſs in the caſtle. 'Mr Charteris, ſays biſhop Burnet, happened to come in, as he was ending dinner, to whom he ſaid pleaſantly, Sero venientibus oſſa.' And being uſed to ſleep a little after meat, he retired to the cloſet, and laid himſelf down on a bed, and, for about a quarter of an hour, ſlept as ſweetly and pleaſantly as ever. Meanwhile an officer of ſtate came in and inquired for him. His friends told him, that his lordſhip, as uſual, was taking a nap after dinner, and deſired that he might not be diſturbed. When he ſaw the earl in that poſture, he

he was ſo impreſſed, that he haſted from the caſtle to a relation's in the Caſtlehill, and throwing himſelf on a bed, diſcovered great diſtreſs of mind; and, when aſked the cauſe of his trouble, ſaid, I have been in at Argyll, and ſaw him ſleeping as pleaſantly as ever a man did within an hour of eternity; but as for me, &c. The time being come when Argyll muſt for ever leave the caſtle, he was, by the council's permiſſion, allowed two epiſcopal miniſters to attend him, viz. Mr Annand, dean of Edinburgh, and Mr Laurence Charteris, for they would permit no preſbyterian miniſters to wait on him. Their diſcourſe with him, and prayers on this tragical occaſion, were very pertinent and becoming; and his lordſhip delivered a very judicious and pious diſcourſe to the ſpectators, in which, among other things, he ſaid, 'Job tells us,' 'Man that is born of a woman is of few days, and full of trouble;' 'and I am a clear inſtance of it. I ſhall not now ſay any thing of my ſentence or eſcape,——nor of the ground of my return;——that which I intend mainly to ſay now, is, to expreſs my humble, and, I thank God, chearful ſubmiſſion to his divine will, and my willingneſs to forgive all men, even my enemies——I know afflictions ſpring not out of the duſt,———are not only foretold, but promiſed to chriſtians, and are not only tolerable, but deſirable;———for God chaſtiſes his own, to refine and not ruin them, whatever the world thinks.——I know many, like Hazael, 2 Kings viii. 13. go to exceſſes they never thought they were capable of. Let rulers and others ſeriouſly read and weigh Prov. i. 20, &c. 2 Chron. xxv. 6.——16. Prov. xxiv. 10, 11, 12. and xxviii. 10. and Iſ lix. eſpecially verſe 15. and avoid what is bad, and follow what is good. For me, I hope, by God's ſtrength, to join with Job xiii. 15. and the Pſalmiſt, Pſal. xxiii. 4. and to truſt, as Pſal. cxlviii. 11. and ſhall pray, as Pſal. lxxiv. 19. &c. cxxiii. 6. &c. and Luke i. 74. 75. and ſhall hope, as Pſal. xciv. 15. I do hereby forgive all that directly or indirectly have been the cauſe of my being brought to this place,——and pray God may forgive them, &c.' When he had ended, he turned to the ſouth ſide of the ſcaffold, and ſaid, 'Gentlemen, I pray you do not miſconſtruct my behaviour this day. I freely forgive all men their wrongs and injuries done againſt me, as I deſire to be forgiven of God.' Mr Annand repeated the words louder to the people, as he did when his lordſhip ſpoke to the ſame purpoſe from the north ſide, and ſaid, 'This nobleman dies a proteſtant.' The earl ſtept forward again, and ſaid, 'I die not only a proteſtant, but with a heart-hatred of popery, prelacy, and all ſuperſtition whatſoever.' Having taken his leave of his friends, he at laſt kneeled down, and, embracing the maiden, ſaid, 'This is the ſweeteſt maiden I ever kiſſed, it being the mean to finiſh my ſin and miſery, and my inlet to glory, for which I long.' Then he prayed a little within himſelf, thrice uttering theſe words, 'Lord Jeſus, receive me into thy glory;' and lifting up his hand, which was the ſignal, the executioner did his work.

Thus died the noble earl of Argyll, a martyr not only to the proteſtant religion, but alſo bearing his laſt teſtimony againſt prelacy as well as popery. His too great compliances with the managers, previous to the affair of the teſt, lay heavy upon him to the laſt; but nothing grieved him ſo much as the unhappy vote he gave againſt Mr Cargil. Paſſing theſe things, as he was executed, not on account of his late attempt, but in purſuance of a ſentence paſſed three years before, for his explication of the ſelf-contradictory teſt, his death was looked upon as no better than murder.

The circumſtances of Monmouth's invaſion on England I muſt leave to the Engliſh hiſtorians. On the 6th of July his army was defeated near Bridgewater, and himſelf ſoon after taken and beheaded. The cruelties committed by Kirk and bloody Jeffries in the weſt are well known. Kirk ordered ſeveral of the priſoners to be hanged up without ſo much as the form of law, he and his company looking on from an entertainment they were at. At every new health a new priſoner was hung up. And they were ſo brutal, that, obſerving the ſhaking of the legs of thoſe whom they hanged, it was ſaid among them, they were dancing, and upon that muſic was called for. It is ſaid, 'That Jeffries condemned above 500 perſons in a few towns of the weſt, whereof 229 were executed; ſome found the benefit, I cannot ſay of the king's mercy, but of the judge's avarice, who was ready enough to grant a pardon to ſuch as could pay well for it; and it ſeems pardons were ſold by him at all ſorts of prices, from L. 10 to 14000 guineas; which laſt ſum this judge of iniquity did not ſcruple to take from Mr Sp—s, and with which he bought an eſtate, that may juſtly be called the field of blood.' But to return to Scotland.

As ſoon as the marquis of Athole and Breadalbin heard of Argyll's being taken, they exerciſed great ſeverity upon the earl's friends and tenants. Four or five gentlemen of the name of Campbell, after having received quarter and protection when they ſurrendered, were ſent to Athole by one of Argyll's near relations. The marquis ordered them and eighteen more to be put to death. He would have proceeded in that work, had not even the council diſcharged more lives to be taken. Parties were afterwards ſent to pull down houſes, break mill-ſtones, and burn woods, and the whole ſhire of Argyll was dreadfully depopulated, haraſſed and plundered for thirty miles round Inverary The earl's eſtate was given to ſtrangers, his children brought to extreme neceſſity, his creditors defrauded, his brother lord Neil Campbell was forced to go at the peril of his life to America, and leave his lady and family behind. In a word the heritors and gentlemen of the name of Campbell, being generally averſe to popery and prelacy, were univerſally oppreſſed through the kingdom.

On the 9th of July, 15 priſoners of the meaner ſort, taken with Argyll, were baniſhed to New England.

On the 13th Mr Thomas Archer was before the council, and by them referred to the juſticiary; but, as his trial did not come on before the 12th of next month, I muſt relate the intervening tranſactions.

On the 14th the magiſtrates of Glaſgow preſented a petition to the council, ſignifying that their priſon was peſtered with many ſilly old women, who were a great charge to the town; whereupon the council ordered them to be whipt and burnt on the cheek ſeverally, who were guilty of reſett and converſe; and that ſuch of them who were guilty of ill principles ſhould be whipt, and all diſmiſſed.

On the 16th Sir William Denholm of Weſtſhiels, Mr James Stuart, ſon to Sir James Stuart proveſt of Edinburgh, and Mr Gilbert Elliot, who, with ſeveral others, were by the parliament referred to the juſticiary, were tried and found guilty of being concerned with the late earl of Argyll, and condemned to be executed when apprehended. My author tells us, that there is no more in the regiſters concerning the reſt, whom the parliament referred to the criminal court, ſuch as the deceaſed earl of London, Sir James Dalrymple of Stair, Colin Campbell of Ardkinglaſs, John Weir of Newton, John Hay of Park, Sir William Scot younger of Harden, Andrew Fletcher of Saltoun, Hume of Baſſenden, and Walter Lockhart of Kirktoun, who were all forfeited.

The ſame day David (afterwards Sir David) Stuart of Cultneſs, and Mr William Spence ſervant to the late earl of Argyll, were before the juſticiary, and found guilty of being with the ſaid earl, and condemned to be hanged at the croſs of Edinburgh on the 22d; but providence interpoſed in their behalf, ſo that the ſentence was not executed.

On the 24th the council ordered between 70 and 80 of the priſoners in Edinburgh, Cannongate, &c. to be baniſhed to the plantations, for refuſing the oath of alledgiance, and ordained Thomas Stodhart, James Wilkie, and Matthew Bryce, priſoners in the tolbooth of Edinburgh, and Archibald Campbell priſoner in Paul's work, who, as the ſentence of the council bears, did miſbehave when before them, to be laid in irons, and proſecuted before the juſticiary.

The ſame day they impowered the earls of Marſhal, Errol, Kintore, Panmure, and the lord preſident of the ſeſſion, to examine the priſoners in Dunnotter caſtle, and baniſh all of them, whether men or women, not already baniſhed, who ſhould refuſe the oaths of allegiance and abjuration. A few were ſet at liberty upon taking the oath of allegiance.

On the 28th the council had above thirty more of the priſoners at Edinburgh before them. Twenty nine were ordered to be baniſhed, of whom there were four who had been been with Argyll, ſix women and nineteen men; the men except thoſe who had been with Argyll, were ſentenced to have one of their ears to be cut off by the hand of the hangman, and the women to be burnt in the cheek, before they were ſent abroad.

According to the order of time I muſt now ſpeak of the followers of Mr Renwick. My author ſays, that ſome eſſays were now made to bring Mr Renwick, and thoſe who adhered to him, from their heights, in order to bring about an union between them and ſome of the preſbyterian miniſters who were wandering up and down the country; and that, for this end, on the 29th of July, theſe two excellent perſons, Mr Robert Langlands, and Mr George Barclay, being informed of one of their meetings, deſired to come to it: accordingly they attended one of the general meetings at Kypes, in the ſhire of Ayr, to ſee what might be done to bring theſe people to hear and join with other ſuffering miniſters; that a good many of the meeting were for this, and ſo the conference began. Theſe two miniſters were on the one ſide, and Mr Renwick, George Hill and others on the other. The miniſters propoſed the laying aſide all debates about former differences and practices, and an union in thoſe things wherein they were agreed; and moved that what they could not agree in ſhould be referred to a competent judicatory. This was refuſed by the other ſide, who inſiſted, that an enumeration of public defections ſhould be drawn up, which the miniſters did not come into, as what would rather widen than heal their preſent breaches. Thus the conference ended, after they had been together ſome days. However, it produced this effect, that many diſcovered their inclinations to join with other ſuffering miniſters.

But it ſeems neceſſary to give the reader the account of this conference as publiſhed in the informatory vindication, in their own words. 'After the defeat of Argyll's expedition, at the deſire of ſome miniſters——we had a conference with them July 22. 1685. in which, inſtead of allaying differences, the propoſals——made for union did heighten our breaches, both with them and among ourſelves;——for though they offered an accommodation, yet, in conference——they maintained, and did not diſown that which bred alienation, 'to wit, a previous information they had ſent to ſtrangers, accuſing us of heavy things; that we had not only caſt off all magiſtrates, but had conſtitute among ourſelves all kinds of magiſtrates, and were for cutting off all, as open enemies, who did not acknowledge our imaginary government; that our ſocieties were only an erroneous faction, and had no power of calling paſtors,' &c. Which information though they did extenuate, alledging that the copy produced was forged, yet they confeſſed ſome ſuch information was written, and went on to proſecute, in effect, the ſame crimination, and ſaid they excerpted all out of our public papers; and farther challenged us for falſely accuſing them in our proteſtation againſt the Scotiſh congregation at Rotterdam, where they, with others, were promiſcuouſly charged with ſundry things in the groſs, which they were not guilty of. We confeſſed it was an overſight, conjunctly to accumulate theſe charges without diſtinction; but taking them ſeparately we offered to make out every thing there charged upon the names inſerted.

Furthermore, in inveighing againſt Mr Renwick's ordination, they accuſed the church of Holland of Eraſtianiſm, and of three ſprinklings in baptiſm, &c. to which he replied, 'That he had received his ordination from the preſbytery of Groningen; and they being foreigners, and not chargeable either with our defections, or any declining from the teſtimony of their own church, but——groaning under ſome corruptions, from which they were never reformed, would come under another conſideration than the miniſters of our own church, defending a courſe of defection'——

The accommodation they offered was upon terms which we thought deſtructive to our teſtimony, to lay aſide all debate, and let all bygones paſs, and go on in the public work, which we did not think was the way to heal our ſore; but we offered, if differences and exceptions could be removed, in a right and honeſt way, we would be moſt willing to join with them, which exceptions were given in in theſe following particulars, viz. 'Their leaving the country, and deſerting the public work, when it was ſo neceſſary to concur in the teſtimony, in a time of ſo great a famine of the goſpel; and not only concurring in the teſtimony, but condemning it in Sanquhar and Lanark declarations, even as to the matter of them, and not condemning the paying of the locality impoſed for maintaining ſoldiers againſt the work and people of God; their countenancing the compliers with the time, and, when abroad, joining with the Scots congregation at Rotterdam, and hearing the indulged preach there; their informing againſt us, and aſperſing us with ſlanders, ſuch as theſe in the forementioned information; and their concurring in the earl of Argyll's aſſociation, againſt which we had ſo many things to object, as above hinted.' Which exceptions we thought ſufficient to demur upon, when after many fruitleſs janglings, we could receive no ſatisfaction about them, nor a public teſtimony ſatisfyingly ſtated, wherein we might both agree and concur, albeit we made an overture in the end, that they and we ſhould endeavour it in this ſort, 'that they ſeverally by themſelves ſhould draw up all the ſins of the time, and we by ourſelves, that ſo, when compared together, it might be ſeen where we differed, and how far we could unite;' but though they ſeemed to be as much for it as we at firſt, yet, in the end, when it was offered, they rejected it. So the conference broke up, and thereafter we were more untenderly dealt with by them, and alſo deſerted by ſeveral joined with us in fellowſhip, who, from that time, began to leave off coming to our general meetings, and to keep ſeparate ways, without reſpect to our former conſented to agreement; and alſo did hear, receive, and ſpread falſe reports given forth againſt us, without premoniſhing us about the ſame, and drew many off from our ſocieties by ſuch means.'

The reader cannot but remember, that, ever ſince the unhappy indulgence, diviſions increaſed among the preſbyterians, and no doubt both ſides were guilty of exceſſes towards one another. But though ſome may think that Mr Renwick and his followers were too preſſing to have the others make a public acknowledgement of their defections, yet they cannot be juſtified in ſlandering Mr Renwick and his adherents, who were now divided among themſelves, ſo that ſeveral withdrew from them: but I chuſe to leave theſe things with the reader, and to proceed to other matters.

On the 30th of July the council ordered about 53 more priſoners to be baniſhed to the plantations, of which 47 had been with Argyll; five refuſed the oath of allegiance and ſupremacy, and were to have one of their ears cut off, and one woman, Grizel Alſtoun, to be burnt in the cheek. Some, who declared their willingneſs to comply and take the oaths, were ſet at liberty.

The ſame day the advocate was ordered to proſecute, before the juſticiary, Thomas Stodhart, James Wilkinſon, and Matthew Bryce, &c. for treaſon, rebellion, and not owning the king's authority. This day the council had a letter from the king, ordering them to baniſh ſuch a number of the meaner priſoners as they ſhould think proper.

On the 31ſt a new committee for public affairs was appointed to ſit during the intervals of council, and about 56, who had been with Argyll, were ordered to be baniſhed, together with 12 others who were to have one of their ears cut off, and four women, for the alledged murder of their baſtard children, and one woman, for refuſing the oaths, to be burnt in the cheek. Several who complied were releaſed, and three were remitted to the lords of juſticiary.

The ſame day orders were given to the magiſtrates of Edinburgh to command their common hangman to cut off the left ear of theſe following men, viz. William MacCall, John Finniſon, John Kennedy, James Corſbie, William Marſhall, Andrew Jardin, Alexander Jamieſon, Alexander Reid, John Hay, William Macllroy, Quintin Dun, William Drenham, John Macllvie, John Cunningham, Thomas Lichard, Archibald Campbell, Alexander Maſon, Matthew Hamilton, Walter Howham, James Murray, Malcolm Bryce, James Wilkinſon, John Simpſon, James Gavin, John Mundel, Andrew MacLean, John Elliot, Robert Edward, John Mitchel, Roger MacMichan, John Weir, Robert Muir, John Downie,——Lawſon Eliſabeth Kirkwal, which was executed on Wedneſday the 4th of Auguſt following.

Eliſabeth

Among others who were baniſhed by the forementioned ſentences, were Gilbert and William Milroys, in the pariſh of Penningham, whoſe ſufferings, being ſomewhat peculiar, may be proper to be briefly related altogether in this place, as my author had them atteſted by the reverend Mr Robert Rowan Miniſter there. When the teſt was violently preſſed laſt year, William took it, and Gilbert compounded with the ſheriff depute to get his name out of the roll: but this year, not being able to take the abjuration, they abſconded with their younger brother Patrick. In the month of June or July the earl of Hume ſent his Merſe militia to their houſes, who plundered them and drove away their cattle. Two days after ſeventy horſemen came in the night time, and carried off what the foot had left, and tortured Gilbert's wife with lighted matches between her fingers. Next morning Gilbert Milroy and his brother William were taken, with a ſervant about 16 years of age, and carried priſoners to Monigaff, where they were brought before the earl of Hume, and examined as to their keeping the church, converſe with the whigs, &c. and, declining to anſwer, were put to the torture of lighted matches between their fingers: but, omitting what they loſt as to their ſubſtance, and ſeveral other circumſtances of cruelty, they were, at laſt, impriſoned at Holy-rood-houſe, all the other jails being crouded. Mr James Colquhoun, the epiſcopal miniſter at Penningham, had no ſmall ſhare in promoting their ſufferings. At laſt, upon their refuſing the oaths, they were ſentenced to have their ears cut off and baniſhed for ten years. When this ſentence was paſſed, they were confined to the iron houſe. The ears of all the priſoners from Monigaff were cut off, except Gilbert Milroy, who was ſo fatigued and weak, that he appeared to be in a dying condition. A little after this Gilbert and the other priſoners in the iron-houſe were taken out, and they who could not walk were carried in carts to Newhaven, and put aboard a ſhip lying there, thruſt under deck, two and two fettered together, to the number of 150. Through hunger, thirſt, and other hardſhips, during their long paſſage of three months and three days, 32 of them died. Mr Evans the maſter of the ſhip was very cruel to them. When they landed at Port-Royal in Jamaica, they were put in an open priſon, and received no ſmall friendſhip from ſeveral in the iſland. After ten days they were ſold for ſlaves, and the money given to Sir Philip Howard, who had a gift of them from the king, but he never had the ſatisfaction of enjoying the price of their liberty, for he was drowned in the Thames, as he was taking leave of his friends, to go for Jamaica. Many of theſe captives died in their bondage; but Gilbert Milroy ſurvived his ſufferings, returned to his wife and other relations, and was alive in 1710. He kept an exact account of the providences he met with. The reader may ſee his remarks in my author.

William Marſhall, ſmith in Glaſgow, was apprehended for wanting a paſs, and was likewiſe baniſhed for no other crime but nonconformity.

On the 1ſt of Auguſt, Mr Archibald Campbell, ſon to lord Neil Campbell, was condemned to die by the juſtices; but appearing before the council, and declaring his willingneſs to renounce all rebellious principles, he was reprieved till December.

We are now come to the 6th of Auguſt, when, according to the juſticiary records, 'Mr Alexander Shields, having ſigned the abjuration, owned the king's authority, but not upon oath, is remitted back to the council.' He was in imminent danger at the beginning of the parliament; for having, in a letter to John Balfour, to be by him tranſmitted to ſome of his friends in Holland, declared his ſorrow for his former compliance, and his mind concering authority, and made ſome reflections on the juſticiary, the ſame bands of the perſecutors, whereupon he was of new brought before the council, the lords of the articles, and the juſticiary. And though much altercation, and many threatnings enſued, he openly owned the letter, and declared that he had great ſorrow and grief for what he had done: that he found that he had diſowned things in the complex in that declaration, which, when it came to particulars, he durſt not do: that he did not think that hereditary ſucceſſion was enough to make a king, and that he owned the lawfulneſs of defenſive arms: however, he was overlooked till now, when the appearance of ſome of his fellow ſufferers brought his name and caſe again to remembrance, whereupon order was given to indict him for maintaining 'that it was lawful for ſubjects, upon pretence of reformation, or any pretence whatſoever, to enter into leagues and covenants, or to take up arms againſt the king, or thoſe commiſſioned by him, or to put limitations upon their due obedience and allegiance, &c. and for diſowning the king's authority, and for owning, or refuſing to diſown the late declaration affixed upon ſeveral pariſh churches, in ſo far as it declares war againſt the king, and aſſerts it lawful to kill ſuch as ſerve him.' &c.

Mr Shields on this occaſion wrote two letters, the one to the advocate, and the other to Sir William Paterſon his old maſter, which he believed ſomewhat mitigated the rage of his perſecutors, and drew up the following declaration of his ſentiments.

1. I Do diſown and abhor all war of ſubjects profeſſedly declared againſt a lawful king as ſuch; all war againſt lawful authority; all war without authority or indeclinable neceſſity; all war founded or deſigned for maintaining principles inconſiſtent with policy or piety; all war declared in that ſenſe related in the proclamation about the declaration, or which may bear theſe inferences therein ſpecified. 2. I do diſown not only all ſuch aſſertions, but all ſuch thoughts, as that it is lawful to kill all ſuch as ſerve the king, or any man, becauſe they ſerve him, or becauſe they differ from us in judgment or profeſſion, or becauſe they have injured us any manner of way. I abhor all aſſertions of the lawfulneſs of aſſaſſinations, murders, or any private killing or ſlaying, under colour of law, or without it, upon any pretence, or for any cauſe whatſoever of uſurped power, revenge, rage, or enthuſiaſtical impulſe, as being againſt chriſtianity and humanity. 3. I do diſown my having any hand, or being art and part in that pretended declaration, directly or indirectly, by my concurrence, counſel, knowledge, or contrivance, or any manner of way; and I diſown all intentions, for my own part, to proſecute or perſecute, or endeavour to puniſh any that have ſerved the king in any capacity, becauſe they have injured me, even though my greateſt enemies; but do think myſelf obliged, in chriſtian duty, to pray for all my enemies, and bleſs them, and do all offices of kindneſs to them. 4. But yet I humbly and conſcientiouſly demur to take that oath for private reaſons. (1.) Becauſe I look upon it as an oath impoſed with a ſevere penalty, which, whatever be the matter of the oath, is a thing I have no clearneſs about for the preſent. (2.) Becauſe I humbly conceive it miſrepreſents the declaration itſelf, wherein I am not clear that ſuch things are aſſerted. (3.) Becauſe, whatever be my own thoughts of the thing, I dare not paſs a judgment on the deed of others ſo ſolemnly, or take upon me to cenſure or condemn them, or juſtify any ſeverity exerciſed upon ſome preſbyterians, who cannot or dare not diſown it.

A great many things paſſed between the lords and him; but, when he delivered the above paper, it was handed about among them; and it was declared, that they were good things in general, and that he maintained good enough general principles, but that he drew bad concluſions from the premiſſes. Then they went through the particulars formerly mentioned, and at laſt inſiſted that he ſhould take the oath of abjuration; but this he refuſed. At the concluſion of three conferences they had with him at this time, he agreed to ſign it if it was worded thus, 'If ſo be ſuch things are there aſſerted,' which, he told them, he was ſure was not the caſe. This, with difficulty, was granted to him. As he ſubſcribed this, he proteſted before them, that none were to think, that, by this, he juſtified the act of ſucceſſion, or the abrogation of ancient laws about, or the want of ſecurity for religion and liberty, or that he acknowledged the divine approbation of it. When all this was over, he was told that he was delayed till to-morrow.

But to-morrow he was ſent to the Baſs. And I am well informed, by my honourable friend Sir Thomas Gordon of Earlſtoun, that he would certainly have ſuffered, if he had not made his eſcape in women's cloaths.

And, ſays the author of the preface to the relation of Mr Shields his ſufferings, 'Though he has wanted opportunity (for what cauſe I cannot determine) to make the like reflections upon the laſt ſtep of that his failing, as he does upon the firſt, yet none has cauſe to queſtion his ſorrow for it: for, after his enlargement out of priſon, it is well known he never failed, on all proper occaſions, with many tears, publickly to own his hearty reſentment of it; particularly, at that ſolemn occaſion of renewing the covenants at Leſmehago, March 3, 1689. he ſtood up before the miniſter, and, in preſence of that vaſt confluence of people, declared his unfeigned ſorrow for that his ſin, to the affecting of the whole multitude, and abundant ſatisfaction of the conſciences of the godly that had been formerly grieved therewith.'

At and after the revolution he was of great ſervice to the army, and much eſteemed by king William. In October 1690, he and other two miniſters offered a large paper to the general aſſembly then ſitting at Edinburgh, containing propoſals for redreſſing ſeveral grievances: and, had the aſſembly either thought it prudent or convenient, at that time, to allow the ſaid paper to be read, or taken the contents of it under their ſerious deliberation, it might poſſibly have produced many valuable effects; but, relying upon the report of their committee of overtures, they judged it inconvenient at that time to read and conſider it. However, Mr Shields, notwithſtanding this, joined in communion with the church of Scotland, and was ſettled at St Andrews, where he continued till he was prevailed with to go with his countrymen to Darien. He was perfectly depreſſed in his ſpirit on account of the fatal diſappointment of that undertaking, which, he ſhews, had it been faithfully and well managed, would have been of great advantage, not only to the nation, but alſo to the chriſtian religion. He died in Jamaica of a ſhort ſickneſs after he left Caledonia. His Hind let looſe, and his treatiſe of church communion, (which laſt was publiſhed after his death by the reverend Mr Thomas Lining,) ſhew him to have been a man of great parts and ſolid judgment. But to return.

The ſame 6th of Auguſt, Thomas Stodhart, James Wilkinſon, and Matthew Bryce, were condemned by the juſticiary to be hanged at the Graſs-market on the 12th. They all three ſuffered according to their ſentence. Thomas Stodhart had been ſentenced to be baniſhed, and yet he was brought before the juſtices, and condemned to die, for no other reaſon but becauſe he owned authority only as far as it was agreeable to the word of God, and would not expreſsly diſown the apologetical declaration. The only queſtions propoſed to the other two, and their anſwers, were theſe: Q. 1. Will ye take the oath of allegiance? A. We will not take it. Q. 2. Will ye own the authority? A. We will own all authority according to the word of God. Whence Matthew Bryce inferred, that they had nothing elſe to charge him with, but that he ſpoke of the word of God. The ſame day theſe three were executed, William Cunningham, John Muirhead, and William Jackſon, declaring themſelves willing to be baniſhed, the criminal proceſs was dropt.

On the 7th of Auguſt the laird of Pitlochie petitioned the council for ſome of thoſe under ſentence of tranſportation to go with him, which was granted; and the ſame day a conſiderable number was ordered to be delivered to Robert Barclay of Urie, or his order.

In an original letter, dated Auguſt 10th, John Jamieſon, John Kennedy, Robert Sharp, William MacCall, Walter Home, James Murray, William Marſhall, and James Corſbie, by whom it was ſubſcribed, and who were among the baniſhed, left their teſtimony againſt owning a popiſh king, &c. and gave a great many excellent advices to their ſuffering friends. On the 11th four more were ordered for tranſportation by the council for refuſing the oaths, and the caſe of other ten priſoners was deferred to farther conſideration. On the 12th of Auguſt, Mr Thomas Archer was at laſt brought before the juſticiary. A good deal of intereſt was made for him, but in vain; nay, a deſign was ſecretly formed for conveying him out of priſon: but he would not comply with it, becauſe he reckoned himſelf a dying perſon; and, as he could not ſerve his maſter any other way, he did not think it his duty to decline a teſtimony for him and his truth by a public death. He was brought in guilty and condemned to be hanged on a high gibbet on the 14th: but he was reſpited to the 21ſt, when he ſuffered. In his laſt words and teſtimony, which are in my author, among other things he ſaid, 'It was always my judgment, and I hope to die in it, that the obligation of the covenants is national and indiſſoluble, and that even the poſterity renouncing them ſhall be found guilty of horrid perjury and apoſtacy before God, ſince in them we firſt engaged immediately to ſerve him.——I have ever oppoſed contentions and new differences——I take not upon me to juſtify the indulged miniſters, neither will I rigidly condemn them; but if their ſeparating from their miniſtry, and preſſing the matter with ſuch heat and violence, be good ſervice done to Chriſt, I have read the ſcripture wrong.——I have lived, and deſire to die, hoping that the Lord will yet glorify his grace and goſpel in the land, and that he hath not brought us under the bond of the covenant immediately to caſt us off, (though we deſerve it), but that the children which are yet to be created may praiſe him.' He owned the king's authority, acknowledged his weakneſs in being a witneſs againſt ſeveral perſons, and concluded with his farewell to all created enjoyments. When on the ſcaffold, after he had prayed and read Iſ. lxv. he ſpoke ſeveral things, and, among others, ſaid, 'my motives were the great apprehenſions I had of popery, and my regard to the kingdom and intereſt of Chriſt here; and I wiſh every one were concerned with the evil and danger of popery.' Here one of the magiſtrates interrupted him; whereupon he added, 'I ſhall only refer you to Rev. xiv. 9. 10, 11.' and ſaid to the magiſtrate, 'you cannot deny but popery is hazardous,' who anſwered, It is true, but there is no fear of it here, bleſſed be God.' Mr Archer replied, 'I wiſh to God it be ſo,' and then continued his diſcourſe, 'What I have farther to ſay is, that as Chriſt hath a kingdom wherein and over which he reigneth as King, ſo he will ſuffer none to uſurp that power, which is his own prerogative.' ——— After he was again interrupted he went on thus, 'Well then, I hope none of you, who are the people of God, need ſtumble at our fall, as if God would let the work reſt at us;——for the people of God have got many backſets, one after another: but the Lord has waited for their extremity, which he will make his opportunity——Mic. iv. 10. 'I will bring them to Babylon, and there will I deliver them.' So I pray and intreat you all to be concerned for your ſoul's intereſt; and as for my own part, I know I have no more to do as to that. Fear of death does not fright or trouble me. I bleſs the Lord, for my lot.' Then he prayed again, ſang Pſal. lxxiii. 24. to the end, and died with great cheerfulneſs and joy. He was about 32 years of age at his death, and, ſays my author, was qualified for being a profeſſor of divinity in any univerſity.

On the 17th of Auguſt the council ordered about 72 priſoners in Leith to be baniſhed to the plantations for refuſing the oaths, among whom were ſeveral women. Many of them ſeem to be the Dunotter priſoners; for, as Argyll's invaſion was now over, theſe priſoners were brought from thence to Leith. Quintin Dick and another were left behind as dying men. The council was pleaſed to come to Leith and ſit in the tolbooth, and re examine them. The few that complied with their impoſitions were diſmiſſed; ſome who were weakly, and had friends to make intereſt for them got off upon bond to appear when called; but the generality refuſing the oaths, as the reverend Mr W. Fraſer and others, were baniſhed. The moſt of thoſe who were ordered for tranſportation were made a preſent of to the laird of Pitlochie, who freighted a Newcaſtle ſhip, Richard Hutton maſter bound for New-Jerſey, to whoſe care the baniſhed priſoners were committed.

Mr William Hanna one of the priſoners, got off by giving in the penalty of 5000 merks. When he was threatened with baniſhment, he told them, that he was now too old to work, or to go to war. Old general Dalziel bitterly replied, that he was not too old to hang: but but that ſame day, being the 22d of Auguſt, that general died ſuddenly. Mr Hanna fell ill, and, being in a dying condition, was releaſed, and got home, after above three years ſufferings.

Mean while, on the ſaid 17th of Auguſt, Sir John Cochran, his ſon, and John called col. Ayloffe, were put a-board a yaught for London. Next day, a royal letter was read, ordering to forfeit and baniſh Charles and John Campbells, ſons to the late earl of Argyll: accordingly they were ordered to be brought to Edinburgh to be tried before the juſt ciary. The ſame day Thomas Ruſſel and John Henderſon were examined on account of the death of Sharp, in which they were ſuſpected to be concerned. They denied the fact, but refuſed to call it murder, and were appointed to be kept cloſe priſoners. On the 20th Ruſſel was baniſhed, and Henderſon ordered to be tried before the juſticiary; but it was well for them both that they found an opportunity to break priſon and make their eſcape.

On the 21ſt Charles Campbell was condemned to die for being with his father in the rebellion, but the day of his execution was left to the council's pleaſure; on the 25th his brother John received the ſame ſentence. And thus, though the managers could not, for ſhame, embrue their hands in the blood of theſe youths, yet they did what lay in their power to leave a ſtain on the children and relations of this noble family of Argyll. But to return to the baniſhed priſoners.

As they generally wrote to their friends, ſo, on the 28th of Auguſt 28 of them, before they ſailed, ſigned a conjunct teſtimony, bearing, 'That now being to leave their own native and covenanted land, by an unjuſt ſentence of baniſhment, for owning truth, and ſtanding by duty, and ſtudying to keep their covenant engagements and baptiſmal vows, whereby they ſtand obliged to reſiſt and teſtify againſt all that is contrary to the word of God and their covenants; and that their ſentence of baniſhment ran chiefly becauſe they refuſed the oath of allegiance, which in conſcience they could not take, becauſe in ſo doing, they thought they utterly declined the Lord Jeſus Chriſt from having any power in his own houſe, and practically would, by taking it, ſay, he was not king and head of his church, and over their conſciences; and, on the contrary, this was to take and put in his room a man whoſe breath is in his noſtrils; yea, a man that is a ſworn enemy to religion an avowed papiſt, whom, by our covenants, we are bound to withſtand and diſown, and that agreeably to Scripture, Deut. xvii. 14. 15.' Then they bore their teſtimony againſt the defections of that day, and for preaching in the fields and houſes, and ſign as follow. John Kincaid, George Muir, George Johnſton, Robert Young, Thomas Jackſon, Andrew Paterſon, John Harvey, John Ford, Chriſtopher Strang, William Spreul, Peter Ruſſel, Robert MacEwen, John Henderſon, John Seton, John Gilfillan, Charles Honyall, James Grierſon, James Forſyth, Walter MacIgne, John MacGhie, Ad. Howie, James Muirhead, Annabel Gordon, Margaret Leſly, Agnes Steven, Margaret Foreſt, Jean Moffat, Annabel Jackſon. In the ſame ſhip were Mr John Fraſer, Robert MacLelland of Barmagechan, William Niven in Pollock-ſhaws, &c. &c.

They ſailed from the road of Leith on the 5th of September. After they turned the Lands end a fever begun to rage in the ſhip, eſpecially among thoſe who had been in the great vault at Dunotter, and in a month's time became malignant, ſo that few in the ſhip eſcaped; moſt of the crew, except the captain and Boatſwain, died, together with the following priſoners: Thomas Graham, Gilbert Monorgan, John Smith, William Cunningham, John Muirhead, Thomas Jackſon, Katha. Kellie, Andrew MacLellan, Thomas Ruſſel, John Hodge, Tho. Gray, John Rama, John Swinton, John Swinton, John Kippen, Will. Spret, James Wardrope, John MacKenman, Tho. Finlater, John Hutchiſon of Wardlaw, Will. MacMillan, Agnes Cohalh, John Kirkland; but, notwithſtanding this mortality, the captain and others greatly abuſed the perſecuted priſoners; for when they who were under deck attempted to worſhip God by themſelves, the captain would throw down great planks of wood in order to diſturb them, their proviſions were exceeding bad. At laſt they arrived at New-Jerſey; but Pitlochie and his lady died on the paſſage. The priſoners met with harſh treatment from the people when they firſt came aſhore; but, a little way up the country, there was a town where a miniſter was ſettled. When the inhabitants were informed of the circumſtances of the baniſhed, they invited all who were able to travel to come and live among them, ſent horſes for thoſe who were not, and entertained them that winter freely, and with great kindneſs. Next ſpring Mr Johnſtoun claimed the priſoners as his property, upon the death of Pitlochie his father-in law, and got them all ſummoned before the court of the province. After hearing both ſides the governor called a jury, who acquitted the priſoners; whereupon moſt of them retired to New-England, where they were very kindly entertained, and employed according to their different ſtations and capacities. Many of them died in the plantations, and the reſt returned to their native country at the happy revolution, as Mr Riddel, William Niven, and Robert MacLellan of Barmagechan.

This laſt-mentioned gentleman underwent a ſeries of ſufferings during this infamous period. In February 1666, a party from Sir James Turner came and lived upon him at diſcretion, till he ſhould pay theſe exorbitant ſums impoſed upon him for his non-conformity. When Mr MacLellan prayed Sir James that the ſoldiers might be removed, he was confined in his court of guard till he ſhould pay his fines, and the ceſs for maintaining the army. At laſt his fine was fixed to 600 merks, and a party of horſe was ſent to quarter upon him, to each of whom he was obliged to give two ſhillings ſterling a day till he paid his fine. This heavy oppreſſion conſtrained him to join thoſe who roſe at Pentland. When that party was diſperſed, he fled to England, where he lived privately four years. He returned again to Scotland, and joined the party at Bothwell. Upon which he was again forfeited, his family diſperſed, and forced to retire to England, where about the end of 1684, he and ſeveral other Scotſmen were apprehended by ſquire Dacres, and ſent priſoner to Dumfries. He lay in irons for ſeveral days in the caſtle there, and was, with ſeveral others, ſent to Dunotter, where he did partake of the ſufferings of that diſmal place, and had his lot with the reſt of the baniſhed. It pleaſed God to preſerve him and his three children, during the voyage, while his wife and other three were left in Scotland to the care of providence. He was ſo weakened by ſickneſs, that he was obliged to be carried aſhore. However, he ſoon recovered, and ſet up a plantation at Wood bridge in New-Jerſey, which he purchaſed, and where he had the advantage of hearing the goſpel preached by the reverend Mr Archibald Riddell. This gentleman continued here from December this year, till June 1689, when he reſolved to return to Britain upon his hearing the good news of the revolution. Accordingly Barmagechan, Mr Riddel and others, ſailed for England, and on the 2d of Auguſt reached the Engliſh coaſt; but they were taken by a French man of War, and carried to Nantz, from thence to a common jail at Rochefort, where were near 200 Engliſh and Dutch priſoners, the moſt of whom were ſent to Thoulon. They were chained two and two by the arm, and at firſt each ten pair were tied with a rope, but, that retarding the journey, after the ſecond day the ropes were no more uſed. Mr Riddell was chained to his ſon, a boy of ten years of age, for whom they were at pains to make three different chains before they could get one ſmall enough for his wriſts. Many died in this journey. When Mr MacLellan, through age and weakneſs, was unable to travel, he applied to the captain for the benefit of one of their carts, but was anſwered by many laſhes of his whip on the face, by which he loſt the ſight of one of his eyes. After a ſix weeks march, they at laſt got to Thoulon, where they were put into a large old ſhip, where he continued 19 months, though all the reſt, after a month's time, returned the ſame way they came to Rochfort, and from thence to Denain near St. Malo, where Mr Riddell continued more than a year, in a vault of an old caſtle, with ſome hundreds of other priſoners.

They lay on ſtraw, and never changed but once a month, and ſo over-run with naſtineſs and vermin. After twenty two months, Mr Riddell and his his ſon were exchanged for two popiſh prieſts, which the the council of Scotland gave for them. When the priſoners at Thoulon were releaſed, by another exchange, the French King would not ſuffer them to return through France; but gave them a paſs, and put them on board a ſhip bound for Genoa, where Barmagechan got a Hamburgh veſſel bound for Cadiz in Spain, from whence he came in a fleet bound for Amſterdam; but by a ſtorm they were drove on the back of Ireland, and the ſhip he was in was forced into Bantray bay there. The Iriſh ſeized the company, ſtripped Mr MacLellan of his cloaths, and kept him amongſt them eleven days, ſo that through the hard ſhips he met with, he fell ill; but at laſt he was releaſed, and got ſafe home to his own houſe at Barmagechan, 31ſt October 1691. From the whole it appears, that all the ſufferings of this gentleman were owing to the perſecution in Scotland. But to return.

On the 11th of September, the council ordered the advocate to proſecute more that were concerned in the attempt of the earl of Argyll; but, as I know not the iſſue of it, I paſs it over.

On the 16th they iſſued a proclamation for keeping the king's birth-day, October 14th, as a ſolemn anniverſary thankſgiving, 'and therein to commemorate his moſt conſpicuous entry to his royal government, and miraculous deliverances;' and, that the reader may ſee what ſolid ground there was for this,

On the 19th a letter from the king was read in council, requiring them to call for the magiſtrates of Edinburgh, and prohibit them from proceeding to any election of magiſtrates or town-council, for the enſuing year, till his majeſty declares his pleaſure to the contrary. If this was not a direct infringement of the privileges of the royal burghs, let the reader judge. Accordingly the magiſtrates were called, and had the king's pleaſure ſignified to them. Theſe infringements were as a preface to what followed in England as to corporations much of the ſame nature.

From ſome letters that paſſed at this time, between the king and counſel, it appears that the miniſters of ſtate in Scotland were not harmonious among themſelves. Informations were taken from Mr John Veitch, and accounts were ſaid to be given by Sir John Cochran, with relation to a correſpondence carried on between the lord regiſter ſecretary Murray, and lord Melvil, and ſome pieces of miſmanagement of the advocate. Biſhop Burnet tells us, that 'Cochran had a rich father, the earl of Dundonald; and he offered the prieſts L. 5000 to ſave his ſon. They wanted a ſtock of money for managing their deſigns, ſo they interpoſed ſo effectually that the bargain was made; but, to cover it, Cochran petitioned the council that he might be ſent to the king, for he had ſecrets of great importance, which were not fit to be communicated to any but to the king himſelf. He was upon that brought to London; and, after he had been for ſome time in private with the king, the matters he had diſcovered were ſaid to be of ſuch importance, that, in conſideration of that, the king pardoned him. It was ſaid, that he diſcovered all their negotiations with the elector of Bradenburgh and the prince of Orange; but this was a pretence only given out to conceal the bargain, for the prince told the doctor he had never ſeen Cochran; but the ſecret came to be known ſoon after.' Paſſing therefore theſe things.

Executions being now very much over, the old trade of fines for conventicles was revived. For one gentleman was fined this month in no leſs ſum than 60,000l. Scots, or L. 5000 Sterling, for his own and his lady's nonconformity.

On the 5th of October, the above-mentioned Mr John Veitch, miniſter of Weſtruther, was made cloſe priſoner at Edinburgh, and his keeper ſolemnly ſworn never to ſuffer any word to come in to him, or go out from him, without the knowledge of the council or their committee. Two ſoldiers were ordered conſtantly to guard the door, pen and ink were taken from him, and thus he continued for 20 weeks.

The ſame day they made an act prohibiting the printing of any books of divinity till they were reviſed and licenſed by the ordinary of the place, and diſcharging all ſtationers and bookſellers from ſelling any ſuch books, under the penalty of confiſcation.

The ſame day another letter from the king was read, wherein his majeſty recommended Bailie Kennedy as his particular choice, to be elected provoſt of Edinburgh, leaving the magiſtrates to the uſual method of electing the reſt of the town-council; but one might readily think that the King might have named all as well as the chief magiſtrate, and taken upon himſelf to nominate magiſtrates in all the royal burghs through the kingdom.

The council having on the 29th, received information of two field conventicles in the pariſh of Camnethan, where ſeveral were preſent in arms, and Mr Renwick preached, Major Wedderburne of Gosford was ordered to inquire concerning thoſe who were preſent, and the heritors through whoſe lands they paſſed.

On the 12th of November a very extraordinary letter was read from the king, diſpenſing with an act of his very firſt parliament. As it is but ſhort, the tenor of it follows.

JAMES R.

RIght truſty, &c. we greet you well. Whereas, in the 12th act of our current parliament, intitled Act of ſupply, there is a clauſe ordaining all the commiſſioners therein named to take the oaths and teſt appointed by law; which clauſe we judge fit, for our ſervice, to require you to put vigorouſly in execution, excepting theſe in the liſt here incloſed, whom we have diſpenſed with from taking the ſame, and ſuch as we ſhall hereafter diſpenſe with under our royal hand. For doing whereof this ſhall be your warrant: and ſo we bid you heartily farewell. Given at our court at Whitehall, the 7th day of November 1685 and of our reign the firſt year

By his Majeſty's command,

MELFORD.

The liſt of thoſe diſpenſed with from taking the teſt contains the duke of Gordon, the earls of Seaforth and Tarquair, lord Oliphant, Richard Cockburn of Clerkingtoun, Alexander Irvine of Drum, John Gordon of Rothemay, Patrick Leſly of Balquhain, Sir George Gordon of Gight, William Menzies of Pitfoddels, James Innes of Drumgaſk, Adam Gordon of Auchmacoy, Francis Gordon younger of Craig, Mr Alexander Irvine of Lairny, Mr Richard Irvine of Kirktoun, the laird of Fetterneir, the lairds of Wartle-Leſly, Alexander Frazer of Kinnaries, MacDonald of Bindecula MacDonald of Largy, MacDonald of Caſſiltoun, Patrick Gordon of Glaſſyrum, John Grant of Ballindallach, James Gordon of Camdel, John Gordon of Baldorny, Alexander Gordon of Auchintoul.

It is eaſy to obſerve here that acts of parliament are no ſecurity under a popiſh prince, when he takes upon him to diſpenſe with them in this manner; for the king not only diſpenſed with the act as to the perſons above mentioned, but reſerved a power to himſelf to diſpenſe with it as to others whom he ſhould afterwards name.

John Niſbet of Hardhill, in the pariſh of Lowdoun, was apprehended about this time. This gentleman had been always active for religion, and an encourager of the goſpel as at that time preached in the fields. In 1664, having a child baptized by an ejected preſbyterian miniſter, the curate declared from the pulpit that he intended to excommunicate him next Lord's day, but was prevented by ſudden death. He was both at Pentland and Bothwell. In the former he was ſo grievouſly wounded that the enemy left him for dead, ſo that he eſcaped. At the latter he behaved with great bravery and courage, and eſcaped at that time likewiſe, but, being known, was proſcribed by proclamation, and a large reward offered for apprehending him. His eſtate and goods were ſeized, and his wife and four children ſtript of all and turned out of doors.

He ſuffered all kinds of diſtreſs from 1679. till November this year, when he, with three of his fellow-ſufferers, were ſurpriſed in a houſe in the pariſh of Fenwick, by lieutenant Niſbet a couſin of his own. They defended themſelves till the other three were killed on the ſpot, and Hardhill ſore wounded and taken. The lieutenant, having ordered him to be bound, aſked him what he thought of himſelf now. He anſwered, 'I think as much of Chriſt and his cauſe, for which I ſuffer, as ever; but I judge myſelf at a loſs, being in time, and my dear brethren, whom ye have murdered, being in eternity.' The lieutenant ſwore he had reſerved him for a farther judgment. John replied, 'If the Lord ſtand by me, and help me to be faithful to the death, I care not what piece of ſuffering I be put to endure.'

He was carried that night to Kilmarnock, and next morning to Ayr, where, by interceſſion of friends, a ſurgeon was permitted to dreſs his wounds; and here he was examined, and from thence ſent to Edinburgh; but that circumſtance is not material. It ſeems ſays an eye witneſs, all this was done that the lieutenant might have the reward publiſhed for apprehending him. My author has given his examination before the council, which, it ſeems, was on the 26th of November, from a letter under his own hand, wherein he ſays 'When he was brought before the council, he knew Perth, Linlithgow, and biſhop Paterſon, &c. The councillors told him that they believed he was acquainted with every thing among the rebels, and would take it as a favour if he would ingenuouſly tell what he knew.——He told them, when they came to particulars, he ſhould ſpeak nothing but the truth; but he could ſay he was more afraid to lie than to die; but he hoped they would be ſo much Chriſtians as to preſs him to anſwer nothing that would burden his conſcience.

'They aſked him what they did in their ſocieties and meetings? He anſwered, they ſung part of the pſalms, read ſome of the ſcripture, and prayed time about. Q. Why are they called ſocieties? A. I am ſurprized at ſuch a queſtion, ſince the thing is plain, and is the name ſuch meetings had in the beſt times of this church. Q. Where are they kept? A. In the wildeſt muirs and moſt retired places. Q. What do ye at your general meetings! (While ſtopping a little to conſider what to ſay to this, one of them anſwered, and gave a more particular and diſtinct account of every part of their way than he could do.) Will you own the king's authority? A. I will not. A. Why? do you not own the Scriptures or confeſſion of faith? (naming ſeveral places, and chap. xxiii. of the confeſſion.) A. I own both with all my heart; but the king is a Roman catholick, and I have not only been educated a Preſbyterian, but ſolemnly ſworn againſt popery. Q. What is that to you? His being popiſh does not bind you to be ſo too, nor hinder you to live in your own religion. A. The contrary appears; for no liberty is given to hear the goſpel, and we are put to the hardeſt ſufferings for hearing it. Q. It is not ſo: you may have the goſpel, to hear when you pleaſe; but your wild principles will not ſuffer you to hear it. A. The contrary is well known: you have taken away preſbyterian miniſters, and left none in the nation within our reach, and put ſuch in their places as are profligate wretches; ſo that poor people neither care nor dare join with them. Q. Were you and ſuch as you clear to join with Argyll? A. No more than with you. Q. Would you have joined with Monmouth? A. No. Another ſaid in banter, It ſeems they will have no king but Mr Renwick; and aſked him if he converſed with any other miniſters than Mr Renwick. He anſwered, he did not.——As to praying for their king, one of them ſaid he knew I was that much a Chriſtian that I would pray for all men. I told them that I reckoned myſelf bound to pray for all; but prayer being inſtitute by an holy God, who was the hearer of prayer, no Chriſtian was obliged to pray when every profligate commanded him; and that it was no advantage to their cauſe when they ſuffered ſuch a thing' He proceeded thus:'

'How it may be with me afterwards, I cannot poſitively ſay,——But this I can ſay, the Lord hath not quarrelled with me for any thing ſince I was a priſoner; but hath always waited to ſupply with all comfort, conſolation and ſtrength, as my neceſſity required. And now, when I cannot lay down my head, nor lift it up without help, and the irons are on my legs, yet, of all the caſes I ever was in, I had never more contentment. I can now give the croſs of Chriſt a more noble commendation than ever. ——Under all my wanderings, in all my toilings, a priſon was ſtill terrifying to me; but immediately at my taking he ſo ſhined on me, and ever ſince, that he and his croſs is to me far beyond whatever he was before: therefore let none feare, or ſtand at a diſtance from their duty, for fear of the croſs; for now I can ſay from experience, that it is as eaſy, yea, and more ſweet, to lie in priſon and irons, than it is to lie at liberty. But I muſt break off at preſent.'

The council this 26th of November ordered him to be proſecuted before the juſticiary. Two priſoners were ordered to be releaſed, and five to be baniſhed for conventicles, and refuſing the oaths.

On the 30th, John Niſbet of Hardhill was arraigned before the juſticiary. His own confeſſion was the proof againſt him; in which, among other things they ſaid that he declared, that the reaſon why he and thoſe who were in his company refuſed to join with Argyll, was becauſe one Clelland told them, that the ſaid Argyll, and his party were againſt all kingly government. My author is of opinion, that he declared no ſuch thing, it being very common for the clerks in writing down the anſwers of the ſufferers, to miſrepreſent them. And it is certain, that the only reaſon given by the ſocieties for not joining with Argyll, was, becauſe they could not eſpouſe his declarations as the ſtate of the quarrel, they not being concerted according to the ancient plea of the Scottiſh covenants, and becauſe it opened a door for a ſinful confederacy. We have had inſtances of unfair dealings his way before now. Hardhill was brought in guilty, and condemned to be hanged at the Graſs market of Edinburgh on the 4th of December next

The ſame 30th of November, John Welſh of Cornley, and Edward Marſhall of Knemuir, who had been formerly forfeited, and having been apprehended, were ordered to be executed on the 4th of December. The former got off by taking the teſt; but the latter ſuffered with John Niſbet of Hardhill.

Mean while Charles Maxwell was this month ſummoned before ſome court at Glencairn church, for collecting charity to the priſoners at Dunotter. He appeared, and, there appearing no proof againſt him, was diſmiſſed; but that ſame night a party was ordered to his houſe to take ten pounds, or goods to the value, for his wife's abſence from the court, though he knew nothing of her having been ſummoned, and to carry him priſoner to Dumfries. It was with difficulty he prevailed with them to take his bond, and his maſter ſurety, to appear at Dumfries when called under the penalty of L. 1000 Scots.

On the 4th of December, John Niſbet of Hardhill, and Edward Marſhall, ſuffered at the Graſs market of Edingburgh, according to their ſentence. Their laſt teſtimonies are in the Cloud of Witneſſes, edit. 4th.

Edward Marſhall left his teſtimony againſt all who had gone contrary to the covenanted work of reformation; owned that he was at Bothwell; but would not acknowledge it to be rebellion. They aſked him if he would own James VII. as king of Britain; he told them, that he owned him as far as he owned God, his cauſe, and people. On which ſome of them ſaid, that was not at all. Then they aſked if he would pray for the king of Britain. He replied, That this was not a place for prayer. Upon which they laughed, and ordered him to remove. After this account he exhorts his friends not to be diſcouraged with theſe threatenings of men for the cauſe of Chriſt; and concludes with recommending his wife and children to God, and taking a comfortable farewell of all worldly enjoyments.

John Niſbet, in his laſt teſtimony, which is in the Cloud of witneſſes, among other things, ſays, 'I have always, ſince the public reſolutioners were for bringing in the malignants and their intereſt, thought it my duty to join with the lord's people in witneſſing againſt thoſe ſinful courſes; and now we ſee clearly that it has ended in nothing leſs than ——open doors, that are made wide, to bring in Popery, and ſet up idolatry in the Lord's covenanted land. Wherefore it is the—— indiſpenſible duty of all who have any love to God, to his ſon the Lord Jeſus Chriſt,——to witneſs faithfully, conſtantly, and conſcientiouſly againſt all that the enemies have done, or are doing, to the overthrow of the glorious work of reformation.——And however it be, that many, both miniſters and profeſſors, are turning their backs upon Chriſt and his croſs, reproaching——you and teſtimony of the day, yet let not this weaken your hands;——for I aſſure you it will not be long to the fourth watch; and then he will come in garments died in blood, to raiſe up ſaviours upon mount Zion to judge the mount of Eſau, and then the houſe of Jacob and Joſeph ſhall be for fire, and the malignants, prelates, and papiſts ſhall be for ſtubble, the flame whereof ſhall be great. But my generation work being done with my time, I go to him who loved me, and waſhed me from all my ſins.' Then he goes on, declaring that he died adhering to the ſcriptures, and all the pieces of reformation attained to in Scotland from 1638 to 1649, and proteſting againſt popery, prelacy, the indulgence and the acceptors of it, and exhorting the people of God to forbear contentions and cenſuring one another, to keep up their fellowſhips and general meetings: and concludes, bidding farewell to all his dear fellow ſufferers, to his children and chriſtian friends, and with committing his ſpirit into the hands of Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt.

And now I have the pleaſure to acquaint the reader, that there is but one execution more of this kind at Edinburgh during this infamous period; ſo that from this, to the beginning of 1688, we ſhall find things taking another turn. Meaſures were concerting for repealing the penal ſtatutes, and it was proper that the perſecution of the preſbyterians ſhould abate for a while, that the papiſts might get footing, and ſo complete the ruin of the reformation. But I ſhall relate things as much in the order of time as poſſible.

On the 9th of December the council baniſhed 17 more priſoners, and next day Mr John Mitchel of Balbardie was ordered to be diſcharged from paying any more fines for his wife's irregularities, becauſe of the king's letter in favour of regular huſbands.

On the 21ſt a proceſs was commenced by the advocate againſt the deceaſed Duke of Buccleugh and Monmouth, Fletcher of Saltoun, and the lord Stair. A very long indictment was given in againſt them and read, but the trial was put off till January next. I ſhall now conclude this bloody year with ſome things of which I know not the dates.

Thomas Richards in the pariſh of Ballantrae was at laſt ſurpriſed by a party of Balquhan's ſoldiers while aſleep, who carried him with them to Stranrawer, and brought him back to Ballantrae. His friends not being able to prevail with him to comply, the commander ordered four of his men to ſhoot him in the fields; but things were ſo concerted that his friends again ſurrounded him, and prayed him to comply; but he told them he was not unwilling to die even a violent death, rather than make any ſinful compliances. Upon this his heroic and Chriſtian reſolution, the captain thought proper to proceed no farther. Thomas was taken to Glaſgow, where, after a month's impriſonment, his ears were cropt, and he was ſent with others to Jamaica, where he was ſold for ſeven years. He died juſt as his time of ſervitude was expired.

By order of the ſheriff of Wigtoun, a party came to Barn kirk in the pariſh of Penningham, and apprehended Sarah Stuart, the wife of William Kennedy, after having damaged the houſe and ſpoiled the furniture, and forced her to go out with them a-foot, with a child in her arms not quite nine months old, to Wigtoun, and leave the other three children behind her, without any to look after them, though the oldeſt was not eight years of age. She was kept eleven weeks priſoner at Wigtoun; for though ſhe was a conformiſt herſelf, yet, becauſe ſhe would not engage never to converſe with her huſband, nor to diſcover him, or inform againſt him, ſhe was brought to all this trouble; for the religion and government of this period were calculated to root out the principles of nature. This was very much parallel with the practice of the moſt wicked of the papiſts, who obliged ſome children to kindle the faggots wherewith their parents were burnt.

A party of Balquhan's men ſeized John Wallace of Knockbrae in the pariſh of New Glenluce, ſpoiled his houſe, and took away every thing they could, becauſe he refuſed the abjuration: nay, they brought in number of ſheep to the church, where they killed and roaſted them with a fire made of the pews. My author has this odd circumſtance well atteſted under the hand of the miniſter of that pariſh.

Many this year died in priſons, and in the way to them, and in their baniſhments; and theſe may all be reckoned to have ſuffered unto death, as James Glover of the pariſh of Tinwal, Andrew Ferguſon in the pariſh of Glencairn, John Munil, James Muncie burgeſs in Dumfries, John Muirhead bailie in Dumfries, James Carran burgeſs in Dumfries, Andrew Hunter and John Stock burgeſſes in the ſame town, Elilabeth Glendowning the wife of John Panter of the pariſh of Duriſdeer; John Renwick burgeſs in Dumfries, Andrew MacLeffan a freeman in the ſame town, and James Sittingtoun in the pariſh of Dunſcore, were baniſhed and died abroad. As all theſe were only from the ſhire of Nithſdale, what multitudes might be mentioned from other places is not hard to imagine.

Many honeſt people were ſcourged for their nonconformity, and then ſent to the plantations. Thus two women were ſcourged at Dumfries by the hangman, becauſe they would ſwear no oaths, and the youngeſt was ſent to Jerſey with Pitlochie. About the ſame time a poor woman, with a man whom they had prevailed with to take the teſt, were bound together and ſcourged through the ſaid town, becauſe he would not ſwear what wandering perſons he had entertained. Jean Dalziel, a tenant of Queenſberry's, was baniſhed becauſe ſhe would not ſwear never to converſe with her huſband, who was declared a fugitive; as was Agnes Hareſtanes, another of Queenſberry's tenants, becauſe ſhe would not promiſe to hear the curates, and diſcover the fugitives.

It is farther remarked at this time, that, when people were prevailed with to take the oaths, the managers likewiſe obliged them to promiſe to ſtand at the ſinging of the doxology, give all encouragement to the eſtabliſhed clergy, apprehend all fugitives and wanderers, and, when they could not apprehend them, that they would raiſe the hue and cry after them for three miles.

The rage againſt preſbyterians was not confined at this time to Scotland, but reached even to thoſe miniſters who had retired to Holland for ſhelter, as Meſſ. James Veitch, Alexander Pitcairn, George Campbell, Patrick Warner, and others. Theſe miniſters, and other perſecuted Scotſmen, had a weekly meeting for prayer. One, who called himſelf Robert Smith, attempted to be admitted among them. Mr Warner, not reliſhing his forwardneſs, and ſuſpecting him for a ſpy, put a ſtop to it. This fellow, who pretended to have been at Bothwell bridge, partly out of ſpite, and partly to get his hire, went to London, and, on the 24th of February this year, gave in an information, at Whitehall, which is publiſhed by Sprat in his copies of informations, p. 173 &c. This paper contains a heap of lies and falſehoods. He pretends to have ſeen Mr Warner at the council of war at Bothwell-bridge, whereas, from Drumclog to that defeat, he was never within forty miles of Bothwell. He alſo mentions Gordon of Earlſtoun elder, as being at that council of war, whereas, the action was over, and he was killed as he was riding to join them. I have not room to conſider the ſaid information in all its parts, neither is it material. However, it ſeems, this occaſioned orders to be given to the Engliſh reſident in Holland to inſiſt with the ſtates general, either to apprehend or to remove theſe baniſhed miniſters from Rotterdam, and their dominions. Something was done to pacify the reſident; but care was taken to give theſe miniſters notice of their danger, ſo that, for a little, they ſtept out of the way.

Thus I have, at laſt, got to the end of this bloody year, which has preſented us with a ſcene of perſecution that had not, at that time at leaſt, its parallel, except in France, where Lewis XIV. revoked the edict of Nantz. The French king's edict of revocation, and other things relating to it, the reader may ſee at more length in my author, vol. II. p. 580. &c.

Biſhop Burnet obſerves, that 'this year 1685 muſt ever be remembered as the moſt fatal to the proteſtant religion. In February the king of England declared himſelf a papiſt. In June, Charles the elector Palatine dying without without iſſue, the electoral dignity went to the houſe of Newburgh, a moſt bigotted popiſh family. In October the king of France recalled and vacated the edict of Nantz; and, in December, the duke of Savoy being brought to it, not only by the perſuaſions, but even by the threatenings of the court of France, recalled the edict that his father had granted to the Vaudois.' But I muſt leave theſe things.

The council regiſters end the 31ſt of December, from which time to the revolution, none of the warrants were booked. Why their actings were not recorded after this, my author does not know the reaſon, but we ſhall now ſoon get to the end of this hiſtory.

CHAP. XIV.

Of the proceedings of the juſticiary and parliament; the King's remarkable letter in favour of the Papiſts; the death and character of Mr Alexander Peden; the ſtate of Mr Renwick and his followers; the various branches of perſecution and acts of indulgence, with other things to the end of the year 1687.

THE perſecution, in ſome of its branches, was not ſo violent, during the three following years, as before. Moſt of the preſbyterian miniſters were baniſhed. The gentlemen and heritors who favoured preſbytery were either dead, forfeited, or baniſhed. Many of the common people were cut off, tranſported to the plantations, ſhut up in priſons, or made compliances; ſo that the government had but few to perſecute, except Mr Renwick and his adherents. But the chief motive of abating the former ſeverities was this: the king, and thoſe about him, had formed the deſign of repealing the penal ſtatutes againſt the Roman catholics, it would therefore have been very indecent to continue the perſecution againſt diſſenting proteſtants; but then, though the acts of perſecution in ſome meaſure ceaſed, yet the ſpirit ſtill remained, and ſome remarkable inſtances of cruelty are recorded by my author.

Many were the fines and exorbitant exactions made upon poor people, of which the following is well vouched from the pariſh of Calder. James Donaldſon portioner of Ralbreſton, for a meeting for prayer at his houſe on a Lord's day, was fined and paid L. 200; John Baxter for ditto, L. 40; Walter Donaldſon for his wife's being preſent, L. 36. Several other people were fined, making in all L. 816. 16 s. Scots. William Stirling, the bailie-depute of the regality of Glaſgow, who impoſed thoſe fines, got them for his pains, which doubtleſs animated his zeal, for he had a gift of all the fines for church-irregularities in that pariſh below heritors. He uſed to threaten the poor people with preſent impriſonment, unleſs they engaged to bring a certain ſum by ſuch a day.

Plunderings and oppreſſions ſtill continued. In the pariſh of Dairy, three men having retired to a wood for ſocial prayer, and, being overheard, a party came and fired upon them, but they happily eſcaped; which ſo enraged the ſoldiers, that they plundered the neighbourhood, and brought the heritors there to much trouble.

In the beginning of this year, a party came to the pariſh of Stonehouſe, in Lanerkſhire, and carried off eight men, and two women who had ſucking infants at their breaſts, for alledged hearing an ejected miniſter. The poor mothers were forced to leave their tender infants to the care of Providence. Another party, commanded by Hallyards, dreadfully oppreſſed the neighbouring pariſh of Glaſford, plundered the houſe, and ſpoiled the goods of one Janet Scot a widow, becauſe it was alledged her ſon had been at Bothwell. Many gentlemen who had been with Argyll, or favoured his cauſe, were forced to conceal themſelves in dens and caves of the earth; and others were forced to pay prodigious compoſitions for their fines.

Beſides Mr Renwick, there were ſome preſbyterian miniſters, both laſt year and this, who preached with the utmoſt ſecrecy, as Meſſ. George Barclay, Robert Langlands, George Guthrie, John Black, and Duncan Campbell.

The lords of juſticiary went on in their forfeitures; and, on the 4th of January, about 80, moſtly of the name of Campbell, were indicted, and ſentenced to be executed when apprehended. Among others were Sir Duncan Campbell of Auchinbreck, Campbell of Barbreck, &c. &c.

The ſame day the proceſs againſt the deceaſed duke of Buccleugh and Monmouth was put off till February, when he was forfeited, and Mr Fletcher of Saltoun was proſecuted for being with Monmouth, brought in guilty, and ſentenced to be executed when apprehended. Lord Stair's proceſs was put off from time to time, till at laſt a pardon was procured for him. His crimes were receiving rent from rebels and traitors, harbouring Mr Alexander Lenox, Mr Alexander Roſs, Mr Alexander Peden, and Mr Alexander Hamilton, who were all called vagrant preachers, ſuffering them to preach and baptize children in his houſe, and drawing a petition for, and giving his advice to ſome of the rebels. On the 18th Duncan Campbell of Allangreg junior, for his accuſion to the late earl of Argyll, was ordered to be executed, along with his father, on the 9th of July next, but remiſſions were procured before that time.

On the 26th of January, the ſingularly pious Mr Alexander Peden died in full aſſurance of faith, and was privately interred in the church of Auchinleck. He was miniſter of Glenluce before the reſtoration. P. Walker tells us, from eye witneſſes, that, as he came down from the pulpit upon preaching his farewel ſermon, when ejected, he knocked on the door three times with his bible, ſaying, 'I arreſt thee, in my Maſter's name, that never any enter thee but ſuch as come in at the door as I did.' Accordingly it was remarked, that neither curate nor indulged ever entered that pulpit till after the revolution, when a preſbyterian miniſter preached there.

During the laſt year he wandered from place to place through Ayrſhire and Galloway. He was indefatigable in prayer, and was one of thoſe fearers of God's name with whom the ſecret of the Lord was; for he certainly foretold ſeveral things that came to paſs. John Ker of Kerſland, Eſq; in his memoirs, ſpeaking of Mr Peden, ſays, 'Abundance of this good man's predictions are well known to be already come to paſs.'—— Accordingly he mentions the following: 'When he was ſick unto death, in the year 1686, he told his friends, that he ſhould die in a few days; but having, ſaid he, foretold many things, which will require ſome time before they be verified, I will give you a ſign which will confirm your expectation that they will as ſurely come to paſs as thoſe you have already ſeen accompliſhed before your eyes; I ſhall be decently buried by you; but if my body be ſuffered to reſt in the grave where you ſhall lay it, then I have been a deceiver, and the Lord hath not ſpoken by me; whereas, if the enemy come a little afterwards to take it up, and carry it away to bury it in an ignominious place, then I hope you will believe that God Almighty hath ſpoken by me, and conſequently there ſhall not one word fall to the ground.' Accordingly about forty days after his interment, a troop of dragoons came, lifted his corpſe, and carried them two miles to Cumnock, and buried them there under the gallows.

Mr Peden, through the miſrepreſentations of ſome, was much alienated from Mr Renwick, and ſpoke bitterly againſt him. This exceedingly grieved Mr Renwick, ſtumbled many of his followers, and confirmed his adverſaries, who boaſted that now Mr Peden alſo was turned his enemy; but, when he was a dying, he ſent for Mr Renwick, and aſked him if he was that Mr. Renwick there was ſo much noiſe about. Mr Renwick gave him a decent and proper anſwer, and ſuch an account of his converſion and call to the miniſtry, of his principles, and the grounds of his contending againſt tyranny and defections, that Mr Peden was ſatisfied, and expreſſed his ſorrow for giving credit to the reports that were ſpread againſt him. As for thoſe papers which were handed about under Mr Peden's name, they are upon good grounds looked upon as ſpurious.

Mr Renwick was not only expoſed to the reſentment of the managers, but alſo ſuffered exceedingly from the tongues of thoſe who had been formerly perſecuted for the ſame cauſe; particularly one of the miniſters who came over with Argyll accuſed him, and thoſe that adhered to him, '1. Of overturning preſbyterian government even to the foundation, and putting in its room a popular confuſion, in committing the trial, both of the degree of ſcandal and cenſure, to perſons that are not church officers; 2. Of thruſting themſelves moſt unhappily into magiſtrate's room, making themſelves a convention of eſtates, and managing both civil and church-affairs by the ſame perſons and aſſembly; 3. Of impoſing moſt unhappy reſtrictions on miniſters in the exerciſe of their miniſtry, and, when they cannot own nor preach upon theſe terms, calling them ſilent and unfaithful, and requiring them to be diſowned, there being now not a miniſter in Scotland, England, or Ireland, ſave one, as he (Mr Renwick) ſaith, in a letter to a friend in Ireland, and he no miniſter of that church either, and that by his own confeſſion.'

His anſwer was in ſubſtance as follows. '1. That they never committed the trial, either of ſcandal or cenſure, in a judicial way, to the people, but only——allowed them to judge how they themſelves were to carry towards the ſcandalous, if the ſcandal might bear the weight of withdrawing from him.——Simple withdrawing is not the inflicting of a cenſure, but only teſtifying that it ſhould be inflicted by ſuch as are competent, Rom. xvi. 17 2 Theſſ. iii. 14.——In a broken ſtate of the church, when church judicatories cannot be had, there muſt be ſome ſuch private withdrawing, elſe all muſt go into confuſion; the faithful partake of other mens ſins, private and popular means of reclaiming offending brethren, and the teſtimonies of the faithful, ſhall fall to the ground. This is not to overturn presbyterian government.——2. If declining magiſtrates, becauſe tyrants, be thruſting ourſelves into the magiſtrate's room, then every man declining a prelate, becauſe not of Chriſt's appointment, thruſts himſelf into the prelate's room.—This is all the import of our declarations. How can it be inſtructed that we have acted as a convention of eſtates? The mere diſowning of the preſent government will not infer it.—As to the expreſſion, what needs ſo much fighting about it?——I wiſh theſe words had been otherwiſe expreſſed. Why are men made ſuch offenders for words? Will ſuch a ſpirit be helpful to the healing of breaches?——We hold none of theſe declarations, or any other things, to have been emitted by judicatories. The ſame perſons having eccleſiaſtical authority, and others having civil authority, cannot concur in one action. We leave this to the tyrant's council, made up of lords ſpiritual and temporal, as they call them. 3. We never in the leaſt intended any reſtrictions on miniſters, but only deſired they might declare the whole council of God, and would have them take a liberty to preach up all duties, and down all ſin. This is no reſtriction or impoſition.——I am againſt the people's deſiring any thing of miniſters but what is divinely bound upon them by the word of God, and eccleſiaſtically by our national and ſolemn covenants, and the acts of our general aſſemblies. As to that, that I ſhould have ſaid in a letter, that there is not a miniſter in Scotland, &c. faithful ſave one, I forgive the ſo ſaying of me, but I deny the charge.——If I have written of miniſters unfaithfulneſs in univerſal terms, it is a wide conſequence to infer I aſſerted there was but one.——That by my own confeſſion, I am not a miniſter of this church, I altogether deny. I ſaid, I am a miniſter where ever I have a call from the people and do embrace it. O that all thoſe who ſhall agree together in heaven were agreeing upon earth! I think, if my blood could be a mean to procure that, I could willingly offer it.'

There were ſeveral more letters interchanged between him and the ſame miniſter, beſides ſome from other hands, containing many accuſations, eſpecially a large information, ſtuffed, ſays Mr Shields, with the groſſeſt miſrepreſentations, all accumulated in one draught of a paper, divulged not only in Scotland, but carried over to Holland and very induſtriouſly ſpread by one Alexander Gordon, once a member of theſe ſocieties. Mr Wodrow ſays, that, in the entry of this year 1686, Robert Cathcart, a very pious and knowing chriſtian in Carrick, who had formerly joined with the ſocieties, but who was now very much for union, and quitting their heights, drew up an information relating to Mr Renwick and his party, that he had no thoughts of its going abroad, but, when he had communicated it to a friend, it took air. It is in his appendix; and there he charges the ſocieties with taking upon them the government in church and ſtate, and the management of both civil and eccleſiaſtical affairs, aſſuming to themſelves the name and title of convention of eſtates, impoſing reſtrictions on miniſters, making canons, &c. Whether ſuch an information as this was a proper mean for union muſt be left with the reader.

On the 28th of January a general meeting of the ſocieties was held at Frierminion, to which the above-mentioned Alexander Gordon, John Dick, and ſome others, came, who were, ſays my author, for uniting with and hearing other ſuffering miniſters as well as Mr Renwick. There was a long conference with the laſt mentioned perſons about many things which he does not inſert, but tells us, that, after they had owned their hearing of Mr Barclay, when he had ſatisfied them in converſation, and becauſe they would not abſolutely diſown Argyll's declaration, and promiſe to do nothing for the future without the allowance of the meeting, they debarred them in time to come from their meeting, and would have no more fellowſhip with them.

When they returned to their conſtituents there was a large meeting of thoſe who were for union with the other ſuffering miniſters, to which an account was given of the conference at Frierminion, and R. Cathcart's information was read, and a copy of it ſent to ſeveral presbyterian miniſters for their judgment. My author ſays farther, that this ſtep of the general meeting at Frierminion, in breaking fellowſhip with ſuch as were for hearing other honeſt miniſters, and endeavouring to make up breaches among ſufferers, did them much harm in the eyes of ſober onlookers.

The reverend Mr Shields tells us, that there were with Mr Gordon ſeveral others who followed the informing trade; eſpecially in Carrick, one Robert Cathcart, John Dick, and others, who never left off, with their clamorous tongues and ſcribling pens, to ſpread their accuſations againſt Mr Renwick: and that Cathcart, in a particular manner, accuſed him and his adherents, 'as ſuch whom the Lord had given up, in a great meaſure, to the deluſions of their own deceitful hearts, to believe lies, &c. and perſevere in the breach of our known covenants in two points.

I. In that of error and hereſy; for, 1. With the papiſts, they would have their church infallible; their practice teſtifies this, in declining a miniſter, be he never ſo faithful, for the leaſt alledged perſonal failing;—2. With the independents, upon the leaſt failing of a miniſter they take upon them the power to depoſe. I think, ſaid he, they needed not to have troubled the church at Groningen with the ordination of their Rabbi Mr Renwick, they might as well have ordained him themſelves, ordination being as much in their power as depoſition; 3. In very little they differ from the ſeparatiſts.

II. In that of church diſcipline and government;——as, 1. Their ſending over a youth, ſcarce read in the common heads of divinity, to Groningen, a moſt corrupt church,——having declined the faithful miniſters of the church of Scotland, and ſet him up in their room, as Jeroboam the ſon of Nebat did when he made idol calves, crying, 'Behold thy Gods, O Iſrael!'——2. By their meddling with things which only belong to a church judicatory, and the higheſt church-judicatory; not only, being laick men, they examine faults, yea, abſolve the guilty, but alſo conſtitute laws and make acts, which none but a general aſſembly could do.——Muſt the goſpel live and die with Mr Renwick, ſuppoſe he was a miniſter of the church of Scotland, which he is not?—For the church of Groningen had no more power to ordain a miniſter of the church of Scotland, than the clergy of England had, long ago, to conſecrate Sharp archbiſhop of St. Andrews.' This was a ſevere accuſation of being given up of God to believe lies, &c, &c. But I ſhall abridge Mr Shields's account of the anſwers given to the above, and the rather that my author Mr Wodrow has entirely concealed theſe.

Mr Renwick, and thoſe with him, lamented their breach of covenant, and wiſhed their brethren, with whom they contended, were ſenſible of theirs in all its parts and articles, for which they were obliged to diſcountenance them, as in complying with, and conniving at many things averſive of the covenanted reformation, viz. the ſupremacy in the former indulgences, &c. their having many of them made made their peace with papiſts; all have owned the head of papiſts, the great pillar and promoter of popery, &c.—But then, though themſelves confeſſed many breaches, yet they denied theſe mentioned by this accuſer, who, ſays Mr Shields, believes, or ignorantly miſrepreſents thoſe with whom he would compare Mr Renwick and his followers. 'For, 1. The papiſts never pretended that every one of their doctors or laicks were infallible,——and the men he accuſes have been ſo far from pretending to infallibility, that they have not declined to publiſh their reſentments and confeſſions of their miſtakes to the world;——but that error they will not confeſs,——that ever they declined a faithful miniſter for the leaſt alledged perſonal failings.——2. He belies the independents, in alledging they take upon them to depoſe miniſters for the leaſt failing; they will diſown that. Mr Renwick did ever abhor that people ſhould take upon them to depoſe miniſters for any failing, the leaſt or the greateſt, nor did he ever allow people ſo much as to withdraw from miniſters upon the leaſt failing, but upon ſuch ſcandals as did bear the weight of withdrawing according to ſcripture rules. They had reaſon and neceſſity to trouble the church at Groningen, not to make a rabbi of him, but——to ordain him a miniſter of the New Teſtament, ſeeing they could neither have clearneſs in point of duty, nor confidence in point of ſucceſs, to ſeek or obtain ordination for him from miniſters at home;——and they did always diſclaim all power either of ordaining or depoſing themſelves. 3. He does not ſay wherein they either agree or differ from the ſeparatiſts. There were never ſeparatiſts who depoſed miniſters for the leaſt failing.——4. If he had been a youth, ſcarce read in the common heads of divinity, he diſcovers himſelf very ill read, when he calls this a breach of church government, to ſend ſuch a youth to a foreign univerſity to be fitted for ordination,——and then, after trial—to be ordained by a reformed ſiſter church, found in their own, and not contradicting our teſtimony, when ordination could not be had at home, without the breach of ſeveral ſtanding conſtitutions of the government; yea, without yielding to ſeveral corruptions threatening the diſſolution and perverſion of the whole of it, yea, without bowing to ſome of the calves Jeroboam had ſet up; for, without——ſubjecting himſelf, either to the idol of prelacy or ſupremacy, or ſomething equivalent thereunto, he could not have got ordination in Scotland at that time.——5. They whom he accuſes never examined faults, nor abſolved the guilty, in a way belonging to any church-judicature, nor in a way not competent to the meaneſt private perſon——in the kingdom;——nor did they ever make any laws or acts, but ſuch as any two or three in ſociety might make, by common conſent, to determine one another; nor did they ever ſay, or dream, that the goſpel ſhould live and die with Mr Renwick; but that they were content to live and die with him, in partaking of goſpel ordinances,—whom they eſteemed a faithful miniſter of the church of Scotland, and worthy to ſit as member of any church-judicatory therein. The church of Groningen did not make him a miniſter of the church of Scotland, but ordained him a miniſter of Chriſt,——a miniſter of the church univerſal, (which is the primary relation of all miniſters,) a miniſter in any church; and, as a perſecuted people in Scotland called him to be their miniſter, ſo he came to have as good right to be a miniſter of the church of Scotland, as Mr Rough, Mr Knox and ſeveral reformers, who were not ordained by the miniſters of Scotland—and therefore the difference between the church of Groningen's ordaining Mr Renwick, &c. and the clergy of England's conſecrating Sharp——is as great, as between a reformed church ordaining a faithful officer of Chriſt's kingdom, and a deformed church conſecrating a knave, no officer of Chriſt's, but of antichriſt's kingdom.'

Thus I have laid before the reader the ſubſtance of theſe unhappy debates, in the very words of the contending parties, and ſhall leave him to judge for himſelf, and proceed to other things of a more public nature, when I have obſerved that theſe things put Mr Renwick and his followers to publiſh their informatory vindication, which took up ſeveral months before it was ready for the preſs.

About the end of January, or beginning of February, there were ſome tumults in Edinburgh, by which the lord Perth the chancellor was much affronted. Biſhop Burnet gives the following account of it: 'Affairs in Scotland went on much in the ſame way as in England. Some few proſylctes were gained.——The earl of Perth prevailed with his lady, as ſhe was dying, to change her religion, and, in a very few weeks after her death, married, very indecently a ſiſter of the duke of Gordon's——The earl ſet up a private chapel in the court for maſs, which was not kept ſo private but that many frequented it. The town of Edinburgh was much alarmed at this; and the rabble broke in with ſuch fury that they defaced every thing in the chapel; and if the earl of Perth had not been conveyed away in diſguiſe, he had very probably fallen a ſacrifice to popular rage. The guards upon the alarm, came and diſperſed the rabble. Some were taken, and one that was a ringleader in the tumult was executed for it. When at the place of execution, he told Mr Malcolm, one of the miniſters of the town who attended him, that he was offered his life if he would accuſe the duke of Queenſberry of having ſet on the tumult, but he would not ſave his life by ſo falſe a calumny. The inacautious miniſter did not call any to bear witneſs of this, but went from the execution to the archbiſhop of St. Andrews, and told him what had paſt. The archbiſhop acquainted the duke with it, and he wrote to court and complained of it. The king ordered the matter to be examined; ſo the poor miniſter, having none to witneſs what had been ſaid to him, was declared the author of that calumny, and turned out: but how ſeverely ſoever thoſe in authority may handle a poor incautious man, yet the public is apt to judge true.' Thus far the biſhop.

A letter from the king dated the 9th of February, came to the miniſters of ſtate, declaring his reſentment of the affront given to his chief miniſter, and ordering thoſe concerned to be brought to condign puniſhment.

Great care was taken at this time to corrupt the youth. And among other things a bond was deviſed, to be ſigned by the ſtudents of the college of Edinburgh, declaring their abhorrence of all tumults, and engaging for the future to diſcourage and diſcountenance them. How far the ſtudents complied with this bond, my author does not know.

But it is well known that a ſtorm of Popery and ſlavery was ready to deſtroy the three nations; and the poor proteſtants in Ireland lay moſt open to the impending deluge, from the multitude of Papiſts who were ready to act over again their former bloody maſſacres. Some miniſters there, and others, had therefore the juſtice and courage to warn their fellow proteſtants of the danger they were in, which was very diſpleaſing to the earl of Tyrconnel the lord-deputy, who therefore emitted a proclamation on the 21ſt of February, againſt treaſonable ſpeeches; for, it ſeems, it was reckoned treaſon to preach or ſpeak againſt popery, or the danger the king's proteſtant ſubjects were in from the deſigns then evidently formed againſt them; but, as the affairs of Ireland are out of my way, I ſhall not trouble the reader with them. About this time the king wrote to the archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, commanding them to enjoin their clergy not to preach upon controverted points i. e. againſt popery, according to the directions given by the late king 1662. But to return to the affairs of Scotland.

On the 1ſt of March David Robertſon writer in Coupar was declared fugitive. And in this month Mr Renwick, deſiring to ſee his old acquaintances, went, with ſome of his fellow-wanderers, to Carrick, where, ſays Mr Shields, they were unexpectedly rencountered with the forementioned Robert Cathcart, and others, who challenged him for coming and offering to preach there; and told him that the people in Carrick were neither for meeting nor converſing with him. After ſome debate about the breach of former communion, they converſed concerning Cathcart's letter and information, which he owned he had wrote, and intended to explain; but that he had wrote of them not as they were, but as they would be; and that he converſed with Mr Renwick as a miniſter of the goſpel, but not as a miniſter of the church of Scotland, and defended his accuſations againſt the church of Groningen as Eraſtian, and holding three ſprinklings in baptiſm. Mr Renwick replied, that many in that church, called it a perſecution to term them Eraſtian and that though they were for three ſprinklings in baptiſm, yet without ſuperſtition, ſince they looked upon it as indifferent. Upon this Mr Renwick was exclaimed againſt, as if he defended the practice of three ſprinklings in baptiſm.' But I ſhall not trouble the reader with theſe debates farther than to obſerve, that, if Mr Renwick and his adherents were too ſtiff and rigorous in points which ſome may look upon as indifferent, they who contended with him do not ſeem to have acted a proper part for bringing about a reconciliation. But theſe things I muſt leave with the reader, and go on to things of a more public nature.

It was known in March that the parliament was to meet next month, and the king's deſign to repeal the penal laws was made no ſecret of, and no method was left unattempted to bring the members to a compliance. The earl of Moray was ſent down commiſſioner; but, according to the biſhop of Sarum, two accidents happened before the opening of the parliament, which made great impreſſions on the minds of many.

'Whiteford, ſon to one of their biſhops, before the wars had turned papiſt. He was the perſon who killed Doriſlaus in Holand, and, to get out of Cromwel's reach, had gone into the ſervice of the duke of Savoy, and was there when the laſt maſſacre was committed on the Vaudois. He had committed many barbarous murders with his own hands, and had a ſmall penſion given him after the reſtoration. He died a few days before the parliament met, and called for ſome miniſters, to whom he declared his renunciation and abhorrence of popery for its cruelty, and owned his having been guilty of ſome execrable murders in Piedmont, both of women and children, which had purſued him with an intolerable horror of mind ever after. He had gone to prieſts of all ſorts, who had juſtified him in all he had done, and given him abſolution: but his conſcience purſued him ſo, that he died, as in deſpair, crying out againſt the bloody religion.

The other was more ſolemn. Sir Robert Sibbald, a doctor of phyſic, and the moſt learned antiquary in Scotland, who had lived in a courſe of philoſophical virtue, but in great doubts as to revealed religion, was prevailed on by the earl of Perth to turn papiſt, in order to obtain that certainty which he could not find upon his own principles. But he was aſhamed of his conduct almoſt as ſoon as he made his compliance, went to London, and for ſome months retired from all company, and, after cloſe application to ſtudy, came to be ſo convinced of the errors of popery, that he returned to Scotland ſome weeks before the parliament, and could not be eaſy in his own mind till he made a public recantation. The biſhop of Edinburgh was ſo much a courtier, that, apprehending many might go to hear it, and that it might be offenſive to the court, he ſent him to do it in a church in the country; but the recantation of ſo learned a man, upon ſo much ſtudy, had a great effect upon many.'

Many of the moſt noted of the eſtabliſhed clergy were brought over to the meaſures of the court, or at leaſt to be ſilent at this juncture. Vaſt numbers of them were become Arminians, and ſeveral were running headlong into popiſh tenets. The bulk of the inferior clergy through the country were groſsly ignorant, negligent, and many of them ſcandalous and profane; ſo that no ſtand againſt popery could be expected from them. The biſhops were a mixed company, and ſome of them did appear at this time againſt the meaſures of the court: but the only appearance made by the reſt of the clergy, againſt repealing the penal laws, was from the ſynod of Aberdeen, who, after ſome ſtruggle with time ſervers, agreed upon an addreſs to Mr George Haliburton their biſhop, in which they moſt emphatically intreated him not to give his conſent to the taking off or weakening the force of the penal ſtatutes which they looked upon as one of the hedges of the proteſtant religion. Biſhop Burnet ſays, 'the nation, which was become very corrupt, and both ignorant and inſenſible in matters of religion, began now to return to its old zeal againſt popery. Few proſelytes were made after this.

The epiſcopal clergy were in many places ſo ſunk into ſloth and ignorance, that they were not capable of conducting this zeal. Some of them about Edinburgh, and in other places, began to mind thoſe matters, and recovered ſome degrees of credit by the oppoſition they made to popery. But the preſbyterians, though they were now freed from the great ſeverities they had long ſmarted under, yet expreſſed on all occaſions, their unconquerable averſion to popery.

The parliament ſat down on the 29th of April, and the king's letter was read, wherein after thanking them for the ſervices they had done in the laſt ſeſſion, and ſignifying how much he had conſidered their intereſt, and ſent down an indemnity for all crimes committed againſt his royal perſon and authority, he adds, 'And, whilſt we ſhew theſe acts of mercy to the enemies of our perſon, crown, and royal dignity, we cannot be unmindful of others our innocent ſubjects, thoſe of the Roman catholic religion, who have, with the hazard of their lives and fortunes, been always affiſtant to the crown, in the worſt of rebellions and uſurpations, though they lay under diſcouragements hardly to be named; them we do heartily recommend to your care, to the end, that, as they have given good experience of their true loyalty and peaceable behaviour, ſo by your aſſiſtance, they may have the protection of our laws, and that ſecurity under our government which others of our ſubjects have, not ſuffering them to lie under obligations which their religion cannot admit of. By doing whereof you will give a demonſtration of the duty and affection you have for us; and do us moſt acceptable ſervice. This love we expect you will ſhew to your brethren, as you ſee we are an indulgent father to you all.——

We need be at no loſs to underſtand whom the king means by his enemies. But it ſeems the favours deſigned for them were to depend upon thoſe he expected for his innocent popiſh ſubjects; but how far they aſſiſted the crown in the worſt of rebellions is not ſo eaſy to conceive, ſince, generally ſpeaking, they have been continually plotting againſt it ſince the reformation. No doubt they were hearty wellwiſhers to king James, and therefore we need not be ſurpriſed at his heartily recommending them to the care of this parliament. 'This love,' ſays he, 'we expect to your brethren, as we are an indulgent father to you all. Upon which my author, who has made many excellent remarks on this letter, well worth the reader's peruſal, ſays, They were mightily obliged to their father's indulgence, for bringing in his butchering children, their baſtard brethren, and making them heirs and portioners with the heirs of the houſe.

The commiſſioner ſeconded this letter with a particular account of the many advantages the king intended for Scotland with reſpect to trade, and endeavoured to perſuade them that his majeſty's deſires were as much calculated for promoting their intereſt as his own ſatisfaction, and concluded with ſaying. By this you will ſhew yourſelves the beſt and moſt affectionate ſubjects, to the beſt, the incomparable, and moſt heroic prince in the world.'

But, notwithſtanding all theſe fine ſpeeches, the parliament was not ſo forward as uſual in returning an anſwer to the king's letter; neither did they chuſe at this time to embarraſs themſelves with their compliments to the throne. Accordingly it was the 6th of May before they agreed on an anſwer; in which, as to what was deſired in favour of the papiſts, they expreſſed themſelves in theſe terms: 'As to that part of your majeſty's letter, relating to your ſubjects of the Roman catholic religion, we ſhall, in obedience to your majeſty's commands, and with tenderneſs to their perſons, take the ſame into our ſerious and dutiful conſideration, and go as great lengths therein as our conſcience will allow, not doubting that your majeſty will be careful to ſecure the proteſtant religion eſtabliſhed by law.' This is the firſt time, ſays my author, that he remembers that the parliament ſpeaks of their conſcience ſince the reſtoration.

The commiſſioner was at no ſmall pains, during the firſt month of the ſeſſion, in cloſeting the members, after the example of his royal maſter in England, and in uſing both threatnings and promiſes, in order to bring them to a compliance, but could not prevail with the moſt of the nobility and gentry, who continued in their oppoſing the deſired repeal.

No ſtone was left unturned in electing the lords of the articles, that the king's favourite ſcheme might meet with no oppoſition there. It was the 27th of May before any draught of an act was agreed to. When it was laid before the houſe, it was warmly oppoſed, and the courtiers were glad to have it remitted to the lords of the articles: but inſtead of bettering it, they made it more diſagreeable to the court; for, after all their debates, they only came into the following draught of an act.——The eſtates of parliament, taking to their ſerious conſideration his majeſty's deſire,—for granting eaſe and relief to his ſubjects, of the popiſh perſuaſion,—and as they are fully reſolved to adhere to the proteſtant religion,—which is, and always ſhall be dearer to them than all their worldly concerns; yet, ſo far as their religion and conſcience will allow, to yield a humble and dutiful compliance to his majeſty's deſires, therefore his majeſty, with advice, &c. ſtatutes and ordains, that thoſe of his majeſty's ſubjects, who are of the Romiſh religion, are and ſhall be under the protection of his majeſty's government and laws for their private and civil intereſts; and ſhall not for the exerciſe of their religion in their private houſes, (all public worſhip being hereby excluded,) incur the danger of ſanguinary and other puniſhments contained in any laws or acts of parliaments made againſt the ſame. It is always hereby declared that this immunity——to papiſts, for the exerciſe of their religion in their private houſes allenarly, ſhall not import any allowance or approbation of their religion, or any ways evacuate, infringe or prejudice the laws and acts of parliament made againſt popery, or in favour of the proteſtant religion,——particularly—the 6th act, parl. 3. of king Charles II. &c.

The chancellor, finding that this would not ſatisfy the King, and being uncertain whether it would paſs in the houſe, thought proper to drop it entirely, ſo that it was never brought into parliament. What debates were in the houſe, were when the firſt draught was laid before them.

Biſhop Burnet tells us, 'That the dukes of Hamilton and Queenſbery were ſilent in the debate, the former having promiſed not to oppoſe the motion, and the king was made to believe that the latter ſecretly managed the oppoſition. Roſs and Paterſon ſo entirely forgot what became their characters, that they uſed their utmoſt endeavours to perſuade the parliament to comply with the king's deſire. The archbiſhop of Glaſgow oppoſed it but fearfully. Bruce biſhop of Dunkeld did oppoſe it openly and reſolutely, as did likewiſe Atkin biſhop of Galloway.' But the moſt of them fell in with the king's deſign, and the chief of them were active for the repeal. Biſhop Burnet ſays farther, that 'Roſs and Paterſon, the two governing biſhops, reſolved to let the king ſee how compliant they would be. Accordingly they procured an addreſs to be ſigned by ſeveral of their bench, offering to concur with the king in all that he deſired with relation to theſe of his own religion, (for the courtly ſtile was now, not to name popery any other ways, than by calling it the king's religion, provided the laws might ſtill continue in force, and be executed againſt the preſbyterians. With this Paterſon went up; but the earl of Middleton, to whom he ſhewed it, perſuaded him to go back without preſenting it.' My author does not know how the biſhop of Aberdeen acted on this occaſion. Ramſay biſhop of Roſs uſed great freedom with the commiſſioner, for which he was brought into trouble. 'The archbiſhop of Glaſgow, and the biſhop of Dunkeld, were both turned out by expreſs order from the king. Paterſon biſhop of Edinburgh was tranſlated to Glaſgow, and one Hamilton, noted for profaneneſs and impiety, that ſometimes broke out into blaſphemy, obtained the ſee of Dunkeld. The king, being diſappointed, ordered his commiſſioner to prorogue the parliament.' I muſt refer my reader to my author's appendix for what was ſaid for and againſt the repeal of the penal laws at this time. Only I cannot but obſerve, that great care was taken that nothing might be publiſhed againſt the king's favourite deſign, or in defence of the ſtanding laws; whereas papers on the other ſide of the queſtion were induſtriouſly diſperſed, and many popiſh books and pamphlets were ſpread for corrupting the the nation,

On the 2d of June, lord Pitmedden was turned out of the juſticiary. His ſteady attachment to the proteſtant religion, and his oppoſition to popery, procured him this. And on the 26th the council emitted a proclamation againſt ſlanderers and leaſing-makers, becauſe ſeveral miniſters, and others, had, in ſermons, and other diſcourſes, alarmed the people, &c.

On the 14th of July Gavin Weir and William MacMillan, who had been in priſon for Bothwell, were releaſed; the former becauſe there was not evidence againſt him, and the latter upon making ſatisfying compliances. But, not to inſiſt now on theſe things,

When the king's project was defeated in this parliament, he fell upon other methods for bringing in papiſts to places of profit and truſt, and overturning the proteſtant religion. Accordingly his majeſty made uſe of a diſpenſing power, and had a party about him that would have us to believe, 'That power in the king to diſpenſe with laws, was law.' To maintain this there were not only mercenary pens ſet a work, but a ſet of judges found out, that, to their eternal reproach, did all that was poſſible for them to compliment the king with the liberties of their country. For theſe gentlemen gave it for law,——'That the kings of England are ſovereign princes; that the laws of England are the king's laws; that therefore it is an inſeparable prerogative in the kings of England———to diſpenſe with penal laws in particular caſes, and upon particular neceſſary reaſons, that of thoſe reaſons and thoſe neceſſities the king himſelf is the ſole judge; and that this is not a truſt inveſted in, or granted to the king by the people, but is the ancient remain of the ſovereign power and prerogative of the kings of England, which never yet was taken from them, nor can be.'——— In conſequence of this a new court of inquiſition was erected, under the name of a commiſſion for eccleſiaſtical affairs, which was againſt an expreſs act of parliament: but, as the king was puſhing his deſign with great vigour in England, as the reader may ſee in the Engliſh hiſtorians, ſo he acted in the ſame arbitrary manner in Scotland; for, though he could not get the conſent of the parliament there to the repeal of the penal ſtatutes, he did it without them by his own diſpenſing power.

Accordingly he firſt turned the beſt proteſtants out of the council, and ſupplied their place with papiſts. Thus the earls of Mar, Lothian, Dumfries, &c. were made to give place to the duke of Gordon, earls of Traquair and Seaforth, and other papiſts. The council being thus modelled to his mind, he ſent them a moſt remarkable letter, of which the following is a ſhort abſtract.

Right truſty, &c, It was not any doubt we had of our power, in the putting a ſtop to the unreaſonable ſeverities of the acts of parliament againſt thoſe of the Roman catholic religion, that made us bring in our deſigns to our parliament, but to give our loyal ſubjects a new opportunity of ſhewing their duty to us &c in which we promiſed ourſelves their hearty and dutiful concurrence, as what was founded on that ſolid juſtice we are reſolved to diſtribute to all, and conſequently to our catholic ſubjects;——for when unnatural rebellions have been raiſed againſt our royal father, brother and us, by proteſtant defenders of thoſe laws,——the Roman catholics have ſtill adhered to the royal intereſt,——ſupported the crown, died for the peace of their perſecutors, and thought nothing too dear to buy the generous character of religious towards God, and loyal towards their ſovereigns. When all this had appeared,——we could do no leſs than ſecure the innocent catholics from theſe pains.——

We have alſo thought fit to let you know, that, as we have performed our part, in ſupporting thoſe of the proteſtant religion, ſo we are reſolved to protect our catholic ſubjects againſt all the inſults of their enemies, and ſeverity of the laws made againſt them heretofore; notwithſtanding all which, we hereby allow them the free private exerciſe of their religion in houſes, in which we ——require you to ſupport and maintain them.——

And as to the end the catholic worſhip may, with the more decency and ſecurity, be exerciſed at Edinburgh, we have thought fit to eſtabliſh our chapel within our palace of Holy rood houſe, and to appoint a number of chaplains, and others, whom we require you to have in your ſpecial protection and care — You are likewiſe to take care that there be no preachers, nor others, ſuffered to inſinuate to the people any fears or jealouſies, as if we intended to make any violent alteration; and if any ſhall be ſo bold you are to puniſh them according to law;——for it is far from our thoughts to uſe any violence in matters of conſcience, conſiſtent with our authority and the peace of our ancient kingdom.—

The reſt of this plain letter contains the king's reſolutions to maintain the biſhops and inferior clergy, and all his ſubjects, in their rights and privileges, and therefore he hopes that all compliance and concurrence will be given to theſe things; ſo that, upon the whole, what his majeſty could not get done by the parliament, he was reſolved to do by his own authority; and indeed it muſt be owned, that ſince the reſtoration, the parliaments of Scotland, which ſhould have preſerved the liberties of the ſubject, complimented the king with an abſolute authority. It is eaſy here to obſerve with what contempt he ſpeaks of the laws for the ſecurity of the proteſtant religion againſt the wicked deſigns of the papiſts; how mightily he extols their loyalty to his father, brother, and himſelf; how he brands the proteſtants as ſeditious and rebellious; and how he had already performed his part in ſupporting thoſe of the proteſtant religion; and conſequently his reſolutions, from this time forward, to ſupport his innocent catholic ſubjects, do not ſeem conſiſtent with his promiſes to maintain the biſhops and inferior clergy. Theſe and other things cannot but furniſh the proteſtant reader with proper reflections.

In September the council emitted a proclamation containing the king's indemnity to the common people in the ſhires of Argyll and Tarbet; but then this indemnity regarded only their lives; their goods and chattels, were expoſed to every one who ſhould be pleaſed to attack them.

I have given a pretty full account of the ſtate of Mr Renwick and his followers, and how he was deſerted and accuſed by ſeveral who had formerly adhered to him. Notwithſtanding all the diſcouragements he met with, he continued preaching, catechiſing, and baptizing; but, as he travelled through Galloway, a proteſtation was given to him by William MacHutchiſon, in the name of all the profeſſors betwen Dee and Cree, of which the following is the ſubſtance.

'We underſcribers — conſidering—the woful effects of diviſion,—eſpecially among ourſelves,—proceeding partly from ſome paying ceſs, hearing curates, taking the late abjuration-oath, and partly from others condemning theſe things, and adhering to the late declaration on the church doors — and to Mr J. Renwick, without the conſent and approbation of the remnant godly and faithful miniſters— we do hereby refer and ſubmit ourſelves, in all theſe, to an aſſembly of faithful miniſters and elders, — the only competent judges of ſuch debateable principles and practices,—and promiſing, on the one hand to give ſatisfaction to the church,—as we ſhall be found guilty—of any thing done by us to the ſcandal of our dear brethren; and, on the other, to forbear to join with Mr J. Renwick, till —his ordination be ſeen and approved of by a competent number of the faithful miniſters of the church of Scotland, —and are willing, upon his ſubmiſſion to his brethren, to receive him into our boſom; — but if he, at the deſire of ſtrangers, or any of our brethren dividing from us, intrude himſelf on our labours—till—we have the mind of faithful miniſters, we will proteſt againſt all ſuch dealing, as horrid and abominable uſurpation. Subſcribed in the name of the whole, by William MacHutchiſon'

As Mr Renwick told his mind to the two men that brought this paper, which, according to Mr Wodrow, was on the 22d of October; ſo, on the Thurſday following, he read it over at a public meeting in the fields, and animadverted upon it, as a paper that overturned many pieces of the reformation, in calling hearing of curates, paying the ceſs, and ſwearing the abjuration oath, debateable principles; and exhorted them, if there were any there that concurred in it, to retract the ſame, and thoſe who were innocent to proteſt their innocence before the Lord, as in his letter to Earlſtoun 1687.

One Welſh of Cornlee gave in likewiſe a verbal proteſtation againſt him: but ſoon after this, as his work daily increaſed, and his difficulties multiplied, Mr David Houſton from Ireland, and the reverend Mr Alexander Shields, took part with him, and were received by him with great chearfulneſs; by which it appeared that it was an unjuſt reflection upon him, that he never deſired to join with another miniſter. How far Mr Shields was againſt ſome of the heights, as my author expreſſes himſelf, that Mr Renwick, and ſome of his followers, ran into I know not; but this is certain, that he concurred with him in the informatory vindication, defended the chief points in controverſy, in his Hind let looſe, and vindicated the heads of his dying teſtimony, in the hiſtory of his life; but theſe things I muſt leave, and conclude this year with ſome things of which I have not the dates, when I have obſerved, that, on the 9th of December, a proclamation was iſſued, offering a reward of L. 100 ſterl. to any who ſhould bring in Mr Renwick dead or alive.

Some time this year Meſſ. William, Patrick, and Duncan Cumings were forced to retire to Ireland. Mr Will. Cuming, after the year 1660, was unanimouſly choſen humanity-profeſſor in the college of Edinburgh, having no other recommendation but his bright parts, in which he outſhone ſix other competitors, and a few years after, was admitted, without trial, profeſſor of philoſophy there. Sharp underſtanding that, before this, he had been licenſed to preach by preſbyterian miniſters, ſo haraſſed him that he was obliged to demit his office, notwithſtanding the interceſſion of ſeveral noblemen and gentlemen, to whom his uſual anſwer was, that he would pervert the nation with whiggiſh and fanatical principles. Mr Cuming then went abroad tutor to lord Lorn, afterward the firſt duke of Argyll. When he left that nobleman he paſſed his time in Holland and France till the death of the late king, when he went to Ireland, where he died. His brother Mr Patrick, who was educated under his care, was fixed, while but 18 years of age, at the ſchool of Irvine, where by his pregnant genius and cloſe application, he raiſed a ſchool ſo renowned, that not only the moſt of the noblemen and gentlemens ſons in the Weſt of Scotland, but ſome from England, Ireland, and France, were educated there. After he had continued 12 years remarkably uſeful, and in great eſteem, notwithſtanding his being frequently puſhed at for his principles, he was diſcharged to teach any longer; however, at the preſſing ſollicitations of the inhabitants, he continued another half year, his ſchool being the chief ſupport of the place. Then, a warrant being granted for apprehending him dead or alive, he was obliged to retire to Holland and France; and at laſt, this year, he followed his brother to Ireland, where he preached the goſpel, as colleague with Mr J. Boyſe, till after the revolution, when he returned to Scotland, and was fixed miniſter at Ormiſtoun, where he died 1732. Mr Duncan Cuming, a younger brother, was governor to a young gentleman who was taught at Irvine ſchool, and was for ſome time one of his brother's aſſiſtants. At laſt he was perſuaded by Mr George Hutchiſon, Mr Wedderburn, and other indulged miniſters, to commence a preacher. This coming to the government's ears, he fled with his brother to Holland, where he ſtudied phyſic. After that he followed his brothers to Ireland, where he acted as a phyſician in Dublin. Such was the reputation he gained in that country, that he was employed by the proteſtant diſſenters to go to Holland with their addreſs to the prince of Orange 1688, which his highneſs graciouſly received, and by whom he was afterwards promoted to be one of his phyſicians to his army in Ireland. He was, like his brethren, eminent for piety, a father to the poor, and a great promoter of the diſſenting intereſt in that kingdom, till his death in September 1727. Mr Boyſe preached his funeral ſermon, and gives his character at large.

In December this year, David Steil, in the pariſh of Leſmahago, was ſurpriſed in the fields by lieutenant Crichton, and, after he had ſurrendered upon quarters, was moſt barbarouſly ſhot, and lies buried in the church-yard there. I now go on to the year 1687.

It is eaſy to ſee, from the former proceeding, what quick advances were making towards Rome. The king's promiſes to the Engliſh council, to preſerve the proteſtant religion, were entirely forgot, and none was ſo bold as to remind remind him of them. It was even dangerous to ſpeak of theſe things in public converſation, for fear of ſome miſchievous conſequences. Proteſtants were turned out, and papiſts ſucceeded them, and none but papiſts, or proteſtants, who were not attached to their own religion, could pretend to any employments; nay, matters were carried on ſo openly, that ſome of the principal catholics could not forbear repreſenting to the king that his proceedings were more dangerous than advantageous to their religion; but James was deaf to all councils which were not violent; theſe only were agreeable to his temper and zeal.

A jeſuit of Liege, in a letter to a jeſuit of Fribourg, dated the 2d of February, gives a clear repreſentation of this, ſaying, among other things, 'It is wonderful to ſee king James's great affection to our ſociety.——Upon father John Keynes's return to England, he gave him a moſt gracious reception, (while earls and dukes were commanded, for ſome hours, to wait for admittance)——and ordered that the candidates for orders ſhould be all exerciſed in the art of preaching; for now, ſays he, England has need of ſuch.——Father Clare being arrived at London——the king forbad him to kneel and kiſs his hand.——ſaying, 'Reverend father, you have indeed once kiſſed my hand; but if I had known then, as I do now, that you were a prieſt, I would rather myſelf, father, have kneeled down and kiſſed your hand; and told him that he would either convert England, or die a martyr.'——Finally, he call'd himſelf a ſon of the ſociety, 'of whoſe good ſucceſs, he ſaid, he was glad as of his own.'——Not long ſince one of the lords objected that they thought he made too much haſte to eſtabliſh the faith. To whom he anſwered, 'I am growing old, and muſt take large ſteps, elſe if I ſhould happen to die, I might perhaps leave you in a worſe condition than I found you.' When they aſked him, 'Why then he was ſo little concerned about the converſion of his daughters, who were the heirs of the kingdom?' He anſwered, 'God will take care of that. Leave the converſion of my daughters to me. Do you, by your example, convert your tenants and others to the faith.' The reſt of this well known letter ſhews what progreſs the king had made in favour of papiſts, which I need not here repeat. Therefore I ſhall briefly relate the affairs of Scotland this year, the moſt remarkable of which was the toleration.

The artillery of the government was chiefly directed againſt Mr Renwick and his followers. Accordingly, as James Cuningham merchant in Glaſgow, and John Buchanan cooper there, were returning from hearing a ſermon in the fields, they were ſent priſoners to Edinburgh, and baniſhed to Barbadoes.

On the 1ſt of February Sir David Dalrymple was admitted king's advocate, in the room of Sir George Mac-Kenzie, who was turned out, becauſe as my author thinks, he had not been hearty in the repeal of the penal ſtatutes.

The ſame day James Sloſs merchant in Glaſgow, and a great many people from the pariſh of Kilbryde, who had been confined for alledged acceſſion to Bothwell, were releaſed; but things of a more public nature require our conſideration.

As all methods were uſed, that the preſent circumſtances could permit, for eſtabliſhing popery in England, ſo the like attempts were made for promoting the ſame cauſe in Scotland. The king, by his royal prerogative, had laſt year eſtabliſhed a popiſh chapel at Holy rood houſe, and allowed the papiſts the exerciſe of their religion in private houſes; and multitudes of ſeminary prieſts having come from abroad, and not a few of the nobility and gentry, and the moſt active perſecutors during the former years, having profeſſed popery, on the 17th of February the council received a letter from the king, with a remarkable proclamation incloſed. In the letter, he tells them, among other things, that, while he thinks fit to give eaſe to tender conſciences, he, at the ſame time, expreſſed 'his higheſt indignation againſt thoſe enemies of chriſtianity, as well as government and human ſociety, the field-conventiclers, whom he recommends to the council to root out with all the ſeverity of the laws, and the moſt vigorous proſecution of the forces, it being equally his and his people's concern to be rid of them.' The king in the proclamation, among other things, ſays,

'We have thought fit to grant, and, by our ſovereign authority, prerogative royal and abſolute power, which all our ſubjects are to obey without reſerve, do hereby give and grant our royal toleration to the ſeveral profeſſors of the chriſtian religion after named, and under the ſeveral conditions, &c. after mentioned. In the firſt place, we——tolerate the moderate preſbyterians to meet in their private houſes, and there to hear ſuch miniſters as either have or are willing to accept of our indulgence allenarly, and that there be not any thing ſaid or done contrary to the well and peace of our reign, ſeditious or treaſonable, under the higheſt pains their crimes will import; nor are they to preſume to build meeting houſes, or to uſe out houſes or barns——It is our royal will and pleaſure, that field conventicles, and ſuch as preach at them, or who ſhall any way aſſiſt or connive at them, ſhall be proſecuted according to the utmoſt ſeverity of the laws made againſt them.——In like manner we tolerate Quakers, &c. and by the ſame abſolute power, we ſuſpend, ſtop, and diſable all laws, or acts of parliament, cuſtoms or conſtitutions againſt any of our Roman Catholic ſubjects;——ſo that they ſhall in all things be as free, in all reſpects, as any proteſtant ſubjects whatſoever, not only to exerciſe their religion, but to enjoy all offices, benefices, &c. which we ſhall think fit to beſtow upon them, in all time coming.——and——do caſs, annul, and diſcharge all oaths whatſoever, by which any of our ſubjects are——diſabled from holding places, &c. and all laws enjoining the ſaid oaths,—and, in place of them, the following oath only is to be taken. 'I A. B. do acknowledge, teſtify, and declare, that James VII. by the grace of God, king of Scotland, England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. is rightful king, and ſupreme governor of theſe realms, and over all perſons therein; and that it is unlawful for ſubjects, on any pretence, or for any cauſe whatſoever, to riſe in arms againſt him, or any commiſſionated by him; and that I ſhall never ſo riſe in arms, or aſſiſt any that ſhall ſo do; and that I ſhall never reſiſt his power or authority, nor ever oppoſe his authority to his perſon, as I ſhall anſwer to God; but ſhall, to the utmoſt of my power, aſſiſt, defend, and maintain him, his heirs and lawful ſucceſſors, in the exerciſe of their abſolute power and authority againſt all deadly. So help me God.' And by our authority foreſaid——we give our ample and full indemnity to all the foreſaid ſorts of people,——and think fit to declare, that——we will never ſuffer violence to be offered to any man's conſcience, nor will we uſe force or invincible neceſſity againſt any man on account of his perſuaſion, but will protect our biſhops in their functions, rights, and properties, &c——and employ indifferently all our ſubjects of all perſuaſions,——ſo long as we find unity and charity maintained.'

This proclamation, called king James's firſt indulgence, ſpeaks for itſelf. Here he not only ſets himſelf above all laws, by claiming an unreſerved obedience to his abſolute power and authority, but requires all his ſubjects to ſwear to maintain him in it; but though he requires obedience without reſerve, yet he has a very evident reſerve in his promiſes to uſe no invincible neceſſity to force his ſubjects to change their religion. In ſhort, this was ſo glaring a ſubverſion of the liberties of mankind, that it was diſregarded by all, except moſt of the counſellors, who, having publiſhed the proclamation with all ſolemnity at the croſs of Edinburgh on the 18th, returned an anſwer to the king's letter on the 24th, acquainting him with their ready obedience to his commands, and their reſolution to purſue the ends of his royal proclamation, and ſignifying their approbation of papiſts being put into places of truſt, and thanking him for his royal word for maintaining the proteſtant religion, as the beſt ſecurity they could have. This obſequious letter was ſigned by the chancellor, the two archbiſhops and others; but the duke of Hamilton, the earls of Panmure and Dundonald, had the honour to refuſe to ſubſcribe it. Wherefore the king, in a letter of the 1ſt of March, ordered the two laſt of theſe noblemen to be put from the council-board, and declared, that, though he was diſpleaſed with the conduct of duke Hamilton, yet he ſuſpended his reſentment for the preſent. In the ſame letter he charged them to ſuffer no preſbyterians to preach without their allowance, and until they had taken the oath enjoined by proclamation; ſo that the papiſts were the only perſons that had the benefit of his majesty's favour at this time, unless it was the Quakers whose affirmation would, I suppose, be accepted. And thus matters stood till the end of March.

Mean while, on the 4th of March, the lords of justiciary passed sentence of death on Campbell of Oab, Campbell of Drumfunish, Campbell of Dalton, and Campbell of Ulva, and ordered them to be executed when apprehended. And on the 8th they passed the like sentence on Lawmont of Meandrynan, Campbell of Aitarich, MacFun of Invernydan, MacCallum of Reanlochtean, MacFun of Drup, and Campbell of Sonachan. All these for their accession to Argyll.

This month of March the informatory vindication of the societies, written conjunctly, as the title bears, by Mr Renwick and Mr Shields, was agreed to. It was printed in Holland, and they took care to disperse as many copies of it as they could. It has been several times reprinted since, and therefore I refer the reader to it.

For reasons best known to the court, the king, on the 31st of March, wrote another letter to the council, called the second indulgence, with an appearance of mitigating some things in the former, in which he says, 'It is now our will and pleasure, and we do hereby authorise and require you, to grant them, or any of them, our said indulgence, without being obliged to take the oath, with power unto them to enjoy the benefit of the said indulgence, (during our pleasure only) or so long as you shall find they behave themselves regularly, or peaceably, without giving any cause of offence to us, or any in authority or trust under us, in our government.'—None of the presbyterian ministers accepted of this indulgence.

Mr Rapin, upon the first proclamation, says justly, The council of Scotland blindly obeyed the king, not only by publishing his proclamation, but even by thanking him for it as a signal favour; and adds, this ought not to appear strange, because the council wholly consisted of men entirely devoted to the king, nor was there any person in public office, who was not, or at least pretended not to be, of the same principles. And a little farther, it is not therefore to the whole Scots nation that this blind obedience is to be imputed, but to their governors, who were but a small part of the people; but if Mr Rapin, who was but a stranger, had traced this matter to its true original, he would have landed it in prelacy; for it is well known that the first parliament after the restoration vested the king with a power to order all things relative to the external government and policy of the church.

The king, finding matters go so well in Scotland, called a council in England, and declared his resolution to issue out a declaration for a general liberty of conscience to all persons of what persuasion soever; and, among other things, said, 'That it was his opinion, as most suitable to the principles of christianity, that no man should be persecuted for conscience sake; for he thought conscience could not be forced; and that it could never be the true interest of a king of England to endeavour to do it.' Accordingly, on the 4th of April, he caused his declaration for liberty of conscience to be published; only he took care to soften his expressions with respect to his absolute power; but this I leave to the English historians. Matters continued much on the same footing in Scotland till July, when a most ample indulgence was published.

Mean while, in the month of April, 16 men and 5 women were banished to America, because they would not own the present authority to be according to the word of God nor disown the Sanquhar declaration, nor engage not to hear Mr Renwick. Their testimony against the evils of the times is signed thus: James Hamilton, James Douglas, John Brown, George White, Alexander Bailie, Gil. MacCulloch, Thomas Brown, John Wight, John Russel, William Hanna, John Stuart, James Richart, John White, John Aitkin, Robert Mitchel, William Howie, Isabel Cassils, Agnes Weir, Isabel Steel, Margaret Weir, Bessie Weir.

On the 4th of May a long process against many country people, for their accession to Bothwell, commenced before the lords of justiciary, who after all the pains that were taken, were obliged to acquit the prisoners for want of sufficient evidence. On the 7th of May others were indicted for hearing Mr Renwick, but the process, for ought appears, came to nothing.

In this month Mr Spreul, who had been prisoner in the Bass for near six years, gave in a petition to the council, craving to be set at liberty. Accordingly, on the 13th of May, the council made an act empowering Charles Maitland the governor of the Bass to release him, in regard of his majesty's late proclamation upon his finding bail to appear before them next June. Mr Spreul signified to the governor, that he did not chuse to accept of liberty upon any terms that signified his approbation of the said proclamation, and therefore was continued in prison till a letter came requiring the governor to set open the doors to him, and tell him he might go or stay as he pleased: wherefore after so long confinement, he came out, protesting against what he took to be wrong in the orders and proclamation, went to Edinburgh, waited on the councillors, thanked them for his liberty, and verbally renewed his protest against the said proclamation and orders. Thus ended the troubles of this good man.

On the 30th of June several were indicted for accession to Bothwell, but the process was dropt.

During these things a process was carrying on against Dr Gilbert Burnet, afterwards bishop of Sarum. He tells us, 'That his continuing at the Hague made the king conclude that he was managing designs against him.' Some papers printed in Holland, and dispersed through all parts of England, reflecting on the proceedings there, most of them wrote by the doctor, inflamed the king the more against him. But that which gave the crisis to the king's anger was, that he heard of his going to be married to a considerable fortune at the Hague. So a project was formed to break off the match, by charging him with high treason for conversing with Argyll and other outlawed persons. The king therefore ordered a letter to be wrote, in his name to the advocate in Scotland, to prosecute him for some probable thing or another; which was intended only to make a noise, not doubting but that would break the intended marriage. The doctor, getting timely notice of this, petitioned the states to be naturalized in order to his intended marriage; which being complied with, he wrote several letters in his own vindication, to the earl of Middleton, which the reader may see in Wodrow's history, Vol. II. p. 609, 610, 611. In the first of these, dated at the Hague, May 3. 1687 he said, That, his being now naturalized in Holland, his allegiance, during his stay there, was transferred from his majesty to the sovereignity of these provinces, and that he would be sorry if any judgment that should pass in Scotland against him, should oblige him, in his own defence, to appear in print, and make a recital of the share he had in affairs for twenty years past, and therein mention many particulars that he was afraid must be displeasing to his majesty. The doctor's first citation or indictment, dated April the 19th, had not then reached him, containing his converse with Argyll, &c. as above; but, when it did, he wrote his second letter to the secretary, and, in a most particular manner, shewed the falsehood of every thing laid to his charge: but, his adversaries willing to make a handle of every thing, the first citation was dropt, and another indictment was drawn up against him, founded upon his saying that his allegiance was transferred from his majesty to the states. He gave a most distinct answer to this in a third letter to the secretary; but no regard was paid to any thing he offered in his own justification, however just and equitable, so that, at last, in the beginning of July, a sentence of outlawry was given against him; upon which Albeville said, that, if the states would not deliver him up, he would find such instruments as would carry him away by force. It must be owned that the doctor had shewn no small zeal against popery; and therefore, as things were then, the reader cannot be surprised though he was singled out as one of the objects of the resentments of a popish king and his complying courtiers. But, to proceed to things of another nature.

At length, on the 5th of July, the council received another proclamation from the king, for liberty of conscience, which they ordered to be published with all due solemnities, and of which the tenor follows.

JAMES

JAMES. II. &c.

WE now taking into our royal conſideration the ſiniſtrous interpretations which either have, or may be made of ſome reſtrictions, (mentioned in the laſt,) have thought fit, by this,—farther to declare, that we proteſt our archbiſhops, &c. in the free exerciſe of their proteſtant religion.—and we do likewiſe, by our ſovereign authority, prerogative royal, and abſolute power, ſuſpend, ſtop, and diſable all penal and ſanguinary laws made againſt any for nonconformity to the religion eſtabliſhed by law in that our ancient kingdom.—And to the end that, by the liberty thereby granted, the peace and ſecurity of our government, in the practice thereof, may not be endanger ed, we—hereby ſtrictly charge all our loving ſubjects, that, as we do give them leave to meet and ſerve God after their own way, be it in private houſes, chapels, or places purpoſely hired or built for that uſe, ſo that they take care that nothing be preached or taught which may any ways tend to alienate the hearts of our people from us or our government; and that their meetings be peaceably and openly held, and all perſons freely admitted to them, and that they do ſignify and make known, to ſome one or more of the next privy councillors, ſheriffs, &c. what place or places they ſet apart for theſe uſes, with the names of the preachers.—and that no diſturbance of any kind be made, or given them, under the pain of our royal diſpleaſure:—provided always that their meetings be in houſes or places appointed for the purpoſe, not in the open fields, for which now, after this our royal grace and favour, (which ſurpaſſes the hopes, and equals the very wiſhes of the moſt zealouſly concerned, there is not the leaſt ſhadow of excuſe left, which meetings in the field we do hereby prohibit,—againſt all which we do leave laws and acts of parliament in full force and vigour, notwithſtanding the premiſes: and do farther command all our judges and magiſtrates, and officers of our forces, to proſecute ſuch as ſhall be guilty of field-conventicles,—— for we are confident none will, after this,—preſume to meet in theſe aſſemblies, except ſuch as make a pretence of religion to cover their treaſonable deſigns againſt our royal perſon, and the peace of our government.——

This liberty was accepted by the generality of the preſbyterian miniſters in the kingdom. For, though they were perſuaded that it was not granted from any regard to them, or their adherents but rather for introducing popery; yet they conſidered that they had a right to it, and that their right had been unjuſtly invaded for many years, and that it would have been a ſtrange thing if they ſhould have been backward to preach and hear the goſpel, when a door was opened for it, becauſe ſome men had a deſign againſt the goſpel in their opening it. Beſides, if they had peeviſhly refuſed this liberty, that would never have hindered the papiſts from reaping the benefit of it, but, on the contrary, would have ſtrengthened popery, by putting themſelves out of capacity to oppoſe it, and the papiſts would have had the the faireſt occaſion imaginable to miſlead the people: and therefore they looked on themſelves as bound to make the beſt uſe of it, becauſe it brought for the preſent a great and ſingular relief to thouſands, who had for many years been groaning under heavy oppreſſions, and gave an opportunity to moſt of the miniſters, who had either retired, or been baniſhed, to return to their native country, as Mr J. Veitch, Mr G. Campbell, afterwards profeſſor of divinity in the college of Edinburgh, Mr P. Warner, Mr Alexander Pitcairn, a perſon of ſingular abilities, Mr James Kirktoun, Mr Alexander Haſtie, Mr Thomas Hog, Mr John Harroway, Mr Andrew Cameron Mr William Moncrief, Mr Patrick Cowpar, and o thers.

The preſbyterian miniſters from different parts of the country met at Edinburgh about the 20th of July, and agreed to accept the benefit of this toleration; and, after ſome reaſoning upon addreſſing the king, which ſeveral were averſe to, a conſiderable number of them agreed to the following addreſs.

May it pleaſe your Majeſty,

WE your majeſty's moſt loyal ſubjects, the miniſters of the preſbyterian perſuaſion in your ancient kingdom of Scotland, from the deep ſenſe we have of his majeſty's gracious and ſurpriſing favour, in not only putting a ſtop to our long ſad ſufferings for nonconformity, but granting us the liberty of the public and peaceable exerciſe of our miniſterial function, without any hazard; as we bleſs the great God who hath put this into your royal heart, do withal find ourſelves bound in duty to offer our moſt humble and hearty thanks to your ſacred majeſty, the favour beſtowed being to us and all the people of our perſuaſion, valuable above all our earthly comforts, eſpecially ſince we have ground from your majeſty, to believe that our loyalty is not to be queſtioned upon the account of our being preſbyterians, who, as we have amidſt all former temptations, endeavoured, ſo are firmly reſolved ſtill to preſerve an entire loyalty in our doctrine and practice, (conſonant to our known principles, which according to the holy ſcriptures, are contained in the Confeſſion of Faith, generally owned by preſbyterians in all your majeſty's dominions,) and, by the help of God, ſo to demean ourſelves, as your majeſty may find cauſe rather to enlarge than to diminiſh your favours towards us, thoroughly perſuading ourſelves, from your majeſty's juſtice and goodneſs, that, if we ſhall at any time be otherwiſe repreſented, your majeſty will not give credit to ſuch information until you take due cognition thereof; and humbly beſeeching that thoſe who promote any diſloyal principles and practices (as we diſown them) may be looked upon as none of ours, whatſoever name they may aſſume to themſelves. May it pleaſe your moſt excellent majeſty graciouſly to accept this our moſt humble addreſs, as proceeding from the plainneſs and ſincerity of loyal and thankful hearts, much engaged by this your royal favour to continue our fervent prayers to the King of kings for divine illumination and conduct, with all other bleſſings, ſpiritual and temporal, ever to attend your royal perſon and government; which is the greateſt duty can be rendered to your majeſty by your Majeſty's

moſt humble,
moſt dutiful,
and moſt obedient ſubjects.

Subſcribed in our name, and in the names of the reſt of the brethren of our perſuaſion, at their deſire.

This meeting of miniſters ſays my author, was but an occaſional meeting, wherein every one acted as he ſaw good, and withdrew when he was not ſatisfied, and was not by delegation from the reſt in Scotland, nor any judicatory; and, if that was the caſe, one would be apt to think they took by far too much upon them. About this time many of the preſbyterians in and about Edinburgh drew up an addreſs ſtill more florid than the above.

This meeting of miniſters at Edinburgh, having thus agreed to addreſs the throne, laid down the ſeveral rules in order to make the beſt of the liberty now granted them. And looking upon themſelves as now freed from bonds and fetters, they ſet up, ſays my author, not only worſhip, but alſo diſcipline and government; their judicatures met, and every thing was done as far as circumſtances would permit. And, at a ſynod that met in a houſe at Glaſgow, Mr William Violant was choſen moderator, and the care of ſtudents of divinity was committed to the reverend Mr James Woodrow, under whom great numbers had their education, and became very ſerviceable to the church of Chriſt in Scotland, and elſewhere In ſhort the friends of liberty, by this toleration, had acceſs to be together, and to ſtrengthen one another's hands. The prince of Orange, on this occaſion, had theſe words to the reverend Mr Patrick Warner before he returned to Scotland: 'I underſtand you are called home upon the liberty granted there; but I can aſſure you that liberty is not granted from any favour or kindneſs to you, or your party, but from favour to papiſts, and to divide you among yourſelves; yet I think you may be ſo wiſe as to take the good of it, and prevent the evil deſigned, and, inſtead of dividing, come to a better harmony among yourſelves; when you have liberty to ſee one another, and meet freely together.

But Mr Renwick and his followers paid no regard to this toleration, and were much offended with those who complied with it, and addressed the king on account of it; and indeed, notwithstanding all this shew of clemency, they were as much exposed as ever. And, as I have shewn the grounds upon which the accepters of the toleration went, I cannot but in justice shew likewise the principal reason why the others did not comply.

1. They considered the granter as a person with whom they could not communicate in any transaction of this nature, being bound by his principles to keep no faith with heretics, and having in this practice discovered, in several instances, his treachery and dissimulation. 2. They considered that accepting a toleration from him was a bargaining with an apostate, bigotted, excommunicated papist, and, as such, under the mediator's malediction, yea, and heir to his own grandfather's imprecations, who wished the curse of God to fall upon such of his posterity as should, at any time, turn papists; and therefore they could not be at peace, associate, or bargain with him. 3. They considered that they could not owe him in the relation of a magistrate, because they had not only renounced him, but, by the laws of the land, he was incapable of government, having neither given, nor could give the oath and security indispensibly required; whereas, did they accept of his toleration, they owned his magistratical authority. 4. They considered this toleration as flowing from his absolute power, a power which all were to obey without reserve, which cannot be limited by laws, &c. and therefore they could not accept of it, without acknowledging a power inconsistent with the law of God and liberties of mankind. 5. They considered that they could not accept of this toleration, without giving a virtual approbation of the dispensing with the penal laws against papists. 6. They considered that the proper tendency of it was to introduce a lawless loyalty, establish the king's tyranny, unite the hearts of protestants to papists, who are called their neighbours. 7. They considered the effects already produced by it. Papists were encouraged, their numbers increased, the executive power was put into their hands, &c. 8. They considered the nature of this pretended liberty as most dishonourable to the cause of Christ: for, though nothing is more desirable than when true liberty is established by the government, yet nothing can be more vile than when the true religion is tolerated under the notion of a crime, and when the exercise of it is only allowed under such and such restrictions. 9 They considered the extent of it, as taking in not only the archbishops bishops, but all quakers and papists, and so opening a door to idolatry, blasphemy, and heresy. 10. They considered the terms as what they could not comply with, especially because they were forbid to speak any thing contrary to the well and peace of his reign, or which may any way tend to alienate the hearts of the people from him and his government, which they looked upon as a prohibition to preach against popery or prelacy. 11. They considered that the acceptance of it was a scandal, and could not but offend the generation of the righteous. 12. They considered the addresses of thanks, made on this occasion, as a train of fulsome and blasphemous flatteries, to the dishonour of God, the reproach of his cause, the betraying of the church, the detriment of the nation, and the exposing themselves to contempt. As to the address formerly mentioned, they say, among other things, that there never was an address of this strain from presbyterian hands, seeing the contents of this address were so contrary to their known principles. Thus, say they, 'It is contrary to presbyterian principles to congratulate an antichristian usurper, for undermining religion and overturning laws and liberties. It is contrary to presbyterian principles to justify the abrogation of the national covenants. in giving thanks for a liberty whereby all the laws are casted and disabled therein confirmed. It is contrary to presbyterian principles to thank the king for opening a door to bring in popery, which they are engaged to extirpate by the solemn league and covenant, &c. &c.' The reader may see all these things enlarged at considerable length in the Hind let loose I shall make no remarks, but only acquaint him, That Mr Renwick and his adherents were not the only persons who were against king James's toleration; for though many of the protestant dissenters in England were pretty forward to congratulate the king for the English declaration, yet Mr Coke says, that it was so drawn in the sight of every bird, that (of his knowledge) many of the sober thinking men did both dread and detest it. And Dr Calamy tells us, that there was not many that could be charged, [viz. with addressing], and that, among the rest, Mr Baxter had no concern in addressing, but set himself at Rutland-house in Charter-house-yard, where he exercised his ministry in conjunction with Mr Sylvester, to make a peaceable improvement of the liberty afforded, so as to do all the good he could. The like did his brethren in other places. But to proceed to other things.

On the 15th of July, John Anderson younger of Westertoun was indicted before the justiciary for speaking in favour of defensive arms, and, being found guilty by the jury, was condemned to die, only the time and place were left to the king. Though it does not appear that the sentence was executed, yet nothing could be a clearer evidence of cruelty than a sentence like this.

On the 5th of October the council published a proclamation against field conventicles, 'declaring, that not only all such persons, whether preachers or hearers, that shall presume to be at any conventicle in the open fields, but also all dissenting ministers, who shall take upon them to preach in houses, without observing such directions as are prescribed by our said late proclamation,——shall be prosecuted with the utmost rigour and severity of the laws,' &c. This proclamation was occasioned by the complaints which the archbishop of St Andrews made of great meetings of people without doors in his diocese, and by the bishop of Glasgow's representing Mr Renwick's frequent field conventicles in the west country.

On the 14th, while the king's birth day was observed at Glasgow with great demonstrations of joy, a narrow search was made in the town, and several were taken, and brought to no small trouble.

Mr Renwick still went on preaching, notwithstanding the hazard he ran from the persecutors on the one hand, and the reproaches wherewith he was loaded by many, even of presbyterians, on the other; but these I shall entirely pass over, since the reader may have recourse to the history of his life written by Mr Shields, who tells us, that in less than five months after the toleration, there were fifteen most desperate searches, particularly for him, both of foot and horse, and that all encouragement might be given to any who should apprehend him, a proclamation was issued, dated October the 18th, 'authorising all officers, civil and military, to apprehend and secure, in firmance, his person, with some others; and for encouragement, ensuring the sum of a hundred pounds sterling for taking him or them dead or alive.'

Sometime this month of October, John and Robert Summers, two brothers, together with William Speir, all in the parish of Cambuslang, were taken out of their beds and imprisoned at Glasgow, on suspicion of being at some field conventicle; and, after ten days confinement there, they suffered a month's imprisonment at Edinburgh, and were brought to great charges, though nothing could be proved against them.

On the 4th of November Pensionary Fagel wrote from the Hague to Mr Stuart, in answer to several letters which that gentleman had wrote to him, in order to know the sentiments of the prince and princess of Orange concerning the taking away the penal laws, in which he told him, 'that it was the opinion of the prince and princess, that no Christian ought to be persecuted for his conscience, or be ill used because he differs from the established religion, and therefore they should consent that the papists in England, Scotland and Ireland, should have as much liberty as is allowed them in Holland. And as to protestant dissenters, they heartily approved of their having an entire liberty for the full exercise of their religion, without any trouble or hindrance; and that if his majesty desired their concurrence in repealing the penal laws, their highnesses were ready to give it, provided that those laws still remained in force, by which the Roman catholics were excluded out of both houses of parliament, and out of all all public employments eccleſiaſtical, civil, and military, likewiſe thoſe other laws which confirm the proteſtant religion, and ſecure it againſt all the attempts of the Roman catholics; but that they could not conſent to the repeal of the teſt, and the other laws that tended to the ſecurity of the proteſtant religion,' &c. And thus king James and his miniſters were exceedingly diſappointed by this full declaration; for, had they only got the opinion of the prince and princeſs according to their mind, they doubtleſs would have made a great handle of it.

On the 7th of November, James Boyle was condemned to be executed at the Graſs market, on the 7th of December, for having been at Bothwell, and for hearing Mr Renwick; but it does not appear that the ſentence was executed.

There is nothing more material that occurs during this year, only in the beginning of it, the ſoldiers continued their ravages, till ſome regiments were called up to England; and, among others that ſuffered by them, the family of Muſſield was greatly oppreſſed.

And, as an evidence that the perſecuting ſpirit ſtill continued, Alexander Keir, ſometime bailie of Stranraer, was impriſoned ſome time this year for alledged irregular baptiſms, as were William Mactyre and Nathaniel Johnſton for being preſent. But I now go on to

CHAP. XV.

Of the proceedings of the juſticiary: the execution of Mr James Renwick: the acts and proclamations of council, and other remarkable things to the ever memorable revolution, with ſome account of the proceedings of the convention of eſtates.

IT is now with pleaſure I am come to the year 1688, which will ever be famous in the annals of Great Britain, on account of the glorious revolution, brought about by divine providence, by which theſe nations were reſcued, not only from oppreſſive tyranny, but alſo from a deſtructive form of popery, deva ſtation, and blood, that was juſt ready to break in upon them; and Scotland, in particular, was freed from the bloody hands of Prelatiſts and their abettors.

The Romiſh prieſts at this time beſtirred themſelves to propagate their faith, filled the country with their catechiſms and manuals of devotion. Popiſh ſchools were erected up and down England, and, in a particular manner, at the Abbay of Holy-rood-houſe, which was not only contrary to law, but an open inſult on the reformation. The better to gain their ends, the ſcholars were to be taught gratis; and it was pretended, that no regard was to be had to difference in religion, and no leſs title was given to this popiſh ſeminary than that of the royal college.

Notwithſtanding the toleration laſt year, all methods were taken to hinder many from reaping the benefit of it. When people hired barns or other houſes for places of worſhip, they were upon ſome pretence or another, greatly vexed and haraſſed; and they who would not go to church were brought to no ſmall trouble, and quarrels were continually picked with preſbyterians; ſo that, had it not been for the revolution, even this toleration had been rendered of no ſervice. Mr Alexander Auchmoutie and Mr Alexander Orrock were diſcharged from preaching any more at Dundee. The latter had once prayed, that the Lord would purge the king from heart idols; which words were miſrepreſented, as if Mr Orrock had ſaid the king was an idolater. In a word, all occaſions were ſought againſt preſbyterians; but,

The grand deſign of the court was to eſtabliſh popery on the ruins of the proteſtant intereſt; but here was the great bar in the way, the apparent heirs of the crown were proteſtants, and all attempts to induce them to change their religion, or even to approve the taking off the penal laws, had been in vain: and therefore a proclamation was publiſhed on the 2d of January 1688, to notify the queen's being with child, and to order public thankſgiving to God, on the 15th, in the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and on the 29th in all other places in England.

In the form of prayer appointed for the occaſion were theſe expreſſions. 'Bleſſed be that good providence, which has vouchſafed us freſh hopes of royal iſſue by our gracious queen Mary. Strengthen her, we beſeech thee, and perfect what thou haſt begun; command thy holy angels to watch over her continually, and defend her from all dangers and evil accidents, that what ſhe has conceived may be happily brought forth, to the joy of our ſovereign lord the king, the farther eſtabliſhment of his crown, the happineſs and welfare of the whole kingdom, and the glory of thy great name.'

The privy council of Scotland appointed the 29th of January to be obſerved as a thankſgiving for the dioceſe of Edinburgh, and the 10th of February for the reſt of the kingdom. There were, however, very few of the tolerated preſbyterians that paid any regard to this, and indeed there was no particular mention of them in the act enjoining this thankſgiving.

This, ſays Mr Neal, ſtruck all the proteſtant part of the nation with conſternation, except a few ranting tories, whoſe religion was at the ſervice of the king whenever he ſhould pleaſe to call for it; and though the jeſuits looked upon the conception as miraculous, and as the effect of a vow the queen had made to the lady of Loretto, and propheſied that it would certainly be a prince, yet the proteſtants ſighed in ſecret, and ſuſpected a fraud; the grounds of which are related at large by the hiſtorians of theſe times.

On the 17th of January Mr James Renwick, with the conſent of others concurring, delivered into the hands of Mr Hugh Kennedy, a reverend and learned miniſter, whom he ſuppoſed to be the moderator of the meeting at Edinburgh, a teſtimony which he had drawn up againſt the toleration, and for the covenants, and the expediency of preaching the goſpel in the fields.

The ſtrength of what is therein ſaid againſt that toleration being exhauſted in what is borrowed from Mr Shields, a few pages before this, I ſhall not here reſume what they ſay upon that head, but ſhortly deduce the ſubſtance of the other two.

'In the next place, conſidering (ſay they) how our covenants are ſlighted, the obligations of them forgotten, and they like to be buried in oblivion, we judge we are neceſſarily called to ſpeak a word of our covenants;——deſiring to bleſs the Lord, who put it in the hearts of his people,——to enter into holy covenants,——and we do teſtify our cordial approbation of, and real adherence unto theſe memorable engagements;——and we are alſo no leſs convinced in our conſciences, that the obligation of our covenants is perpetual, and binding upon poſterity;— theſe engagements are national promiſes, laying in pledge the public faith. Certainly that of the jewiſh nobles, not to exact uſury of their brethren, would have brought their poſterity under the curſe, if they ſhould have done it, Neh. v. 12. 13. They are national vows, whereby they devoted themſelves and their poſterity to be the lord's people:——the Rechabites were bound to obſerve the vows of their forefather Jonadab. They are national oaths, and theſe do oblige poſterity. Joſeph took an oath of the children of Iſrael to carry up his bones to Canaan, Gen. l. 25. which the poſterity——found' ſtraitly ſworn to obſerve, Exod. xxx, 19.——They are national covenants, wherein king, parliament, and people, do covenant with each other to perform their ſeveral and reſpective duties as to religion and liberty; theſe oblige poſterity, as Iſrael's covenant with the Gibeonites, Joſh ix. 15. 19. for the breach whereof, many ages after, the poſterity was plagued, 2 Sam. xxi. 1.' Several other things are advanced to the ſame purpoſe; and then they go on, ſaying, 'We cannot but profeſs the ſorrow of our hearts, and teſtify the abhorrence of our ſouls againſt all the breaches, injuries, or affronts, that have been, or are offered, or done to our covenants, national and ſolemn league, which now (alas) are like to be deſpiſed and buried in forgetfulneſs.——Particularly, we teſtify againſt the ſinful, ſhameful, and ſcandalous defections of many miniſters in this point, by their laying by theſe ſacred covenants, forbearing to preach plainly the obligation of them, to diſcover particularly the breaches of them, and to mention them in the engagements which they require of parents when they preſent their children to baptiſm.——

'In the last place, because field meetings for gospel ordinances—are now, by wicked and sanguinary laws—interdicted and discharged under pain of death, therefore we must testify our abhorrence of this cruelty, when others are silent, and signify also our reasons of endeavouring to maintain these interdicted meetings 1.—It is necessary at all times, that Christians should meet together for gospel ordinances, whether the magistrate will or not,—if they cannot get the gospel in houses, they must have it where ever they can.—2 These meetings must be as public as may be with conveniency and prudence, especially—when wickedness is encouraged, and a witness for truth suppressed;—for then the call of God is—for public and solemn humiliation, which cannot be done in private; the nature and end of meetings for gospel ordinances is for a public testimony for Christ against all sin, and every dishonour done to the Son of God—The nature and business of the gospel-ministry is such, that it obliges them that exercise it to endeavour all publicness, without which they cannot discharge the extent of their instructions.—3 Keeping of field-meetings now, is not only most convenient for testifying, but a very significant testimony, in itself, against the popish toleration,—against that wicked law that discharges them as criminal: it is a testimony for the headship, honour, and princely prerogative of Jesus—since, in these meetings, there is a particular declaration of our holding our ministry, and the exercise thereof, from Christ alone, without any dependence on, or subordination to, or license from, his usurping enemies.—It is a testimony for our covenants, the owning whereof is declared criminal by the same law that discharges these meetings.—4. To give over field meetings altogether, at this time, would be very stumbling to friends,—and to enemies prove very hardening and encouraging in their wicked design of banishing all meetings out of the land.'—They conclude with the epilogue of the ministers of Lancaster, used by them in their testimony against the toleration.

Thus the reader may judge for himself whether Mr Renwick and his followers, or those who accepted the foresaid toleration, acted most consistent with their principles.

I shall only add, that this worthy minister was in a little time called to seal his testimony with his blood of; which I shall give an account, when I have observed, that, on the 3d of February, Mr David Williamson, who had a numerous congregation in the west-kirk parish, was, without being ever told the cause, apprehended, and kept a fortnight in prison at Edinburgh, and in July brought before the council, at the malicious accusation of one Mushet, for not praying for the pretended prince of Wales; but nothing could be made appear. Sir Patrick Nisbet of Dean, who countenanced Mr Williamson's ministry, was fined in L. 300 sterling, for words Mushet declared he had spoke disrespectfully of the government.

The order of time leads me now to relate the last part of the sufferings of Mr Renwick, who still continued preaching and catechising. At last, after he delivered the above testimony, he went to Fife, where he continued preaching till the last of January, when he returned late at night to Edinburgh, and lodged at a friend's house on the Castle-hill, who dealt in English goods. One Thomas Justice, a custom-house officer getting notice of a stranger's being there, came next morning with some other officers, on pretence of searching for prohibited goods. Mr Renwick, upon hearing the noise, came out of his room Justice, standing at the door, said, My life for it, this is Mr Renwick. Upon this Mr Renwick went to another door, and finding it guarded, discharged a pistol, by which he got out, and, had it not been for a blow he received in the breast, he would have made his escape; but, as he was running, he fell several times, and at last was taken and carried directly to the court of guard; from thence before a committee of the council, who ordered him to be laid in irons. Then he had an opportunity of spreading his case before God, and of praying for grace to enable him to bear what he might be called to suffer, and that his enemies might be restrained from torturing his body.

Before he received his indictment, he was taken to the viscount of Tarbet's chamber and there examined concerning his owning the authority of king James VII. the cess, and carrying arms at field meetings, and delivered himself with freedom and boldness to the astonishment of all present. He was the first that was examined concerning the cess. A pocket book was found about him in which were the notes of two sermons he had preached on these points, which he owned. There was also some capital letters in the same book, such as, AS. MS. JW. AW. PR. PA. MM. at G. where a hat was left. The committee was very urgent to know these names; and Mr Renwick, partly to avoid torture, and partly because he could not make them more obnoxious than they were, ingenuously declared that they were the names of Mess. Alexander Shields, Michael Shields, James Wilson, Archibald Wilson, Peter Rayning, Peter Aird, who were all out of their reach. He made some demur as to the last, till he was assured, that he should come to no trouble, and then he told that it was one Mr Miller at Glasgow. This openness greatly softened the rage of his enemies. Being asked what persuasion he was of? He answered, of the protestant presbyterian persuasion, adhering to the old presbyterian principles, which were once generally professed by the church and nation from 1640 to 1660.

On the 3d of February he received his indictment, in which it is said, 'That, having shaken off the fear of God, and regard to his majesty's laws and authority, and having entered into the society of rebels of most damnable and pernicious principles and disloyal practices, he had taken upon him to be a preacher to these traitors, and had become so desperate a villain, as openly to preach in the fields, declaiming against the king's authority, asserting that he was an usurper, and that it was unlawful to pay cess, but lawful for subjects to rise in arms and make war against him, and those commissioned by him; for which crimes he had been denounced and intercommuned, and a reward of L. 100 sterling offered to any that should apprehend him; but, notwithstanding all this, he still persisted in his obstinacy, keeping conventicles in the fields, and requiring his hearers to come armed to these rendezvouses of rebellion.——And, being apprehended within the city of Edinburgh, he did desperately fire upon the officers, that came to take him; and, being brought before the lord chancellor, did openly deny and decline the king's authority, asserting him to be an usurper, and owning that he had preached these things, and had traiterously declared at the viscount of Tarbet's, that he could not in conscience acknowledge the king to be his lawful sovereign, and that the lineal succession did not give a right to govern, and that it was unlawful to pay cess, because it was imposed for maintaining of forces to suppress the gospel; and that all who paid the cess were involved in that guilt, and adhered to his preaching-book, declaring the same to be his hand writ.' To all which he was to answer on the 8th of February. To the indictment was added a list of 45, out of which 15 were to be chosen to be the jury, with a list of the witnesses to be brought against him, for which I must refer the reader to the history of his life.

After receiving his indictment, his pious mother, Elisabeth Carsan, was permitted now and then to see him. He frequently declared his grief on account of his leaving his flock; but on sabbath, February 5. he declared that, if it was his choice, he could not without terror think of continuing much longer in this conflict with a body of sin and death; and yet he durst not vary in the least from his testimony. In a letter February 6. he desired that the persons whose names he had deciphered might be acquainted with it, and concludes, 'I desire none may be troubled on my behalf, but rather rejoice with him, who, with hope and joy, is waiting for his marriage and coronation-hour.' Another time his mother asked him how he was. He answered he was well; but that, since his last examination, he could hardly pray. At which, when she seemed to be surprized, he added, 'I can hardly pray, being so much taken up with praising, and ravished with the joy of the Lord.' When she farther expressed her fears, saying, 'How shall I look to that head, and these hands set up among the rest upon the ports of the city? I have so

ſo much of ſelf that I ſhall never be able to endure it.' He ſmiled, telling her that ſhe ſhould not ſee that; for, ſaid he, 'I have offered my life to the Lord, and have fought that he may bind them up, that they may do no more; and I am perſuaded that they ſhall not be permitted to torture my body, nor touch one hair of my head farther.' He was always afraid of torture; but now his fears were all over. Some other friends were allowed to viſit him, whom he exhorted to make ſure their peace with God, and to ſtudy ſteadfaſtneſs in his ways: and when they were regretting their loſs of him, he ſaid, 'That they had more reaſon to bleſs the Lord, that he ſhould now be taken away from theſe reproaches which had broken his heart, which could no otherwiſe be wiped off, even though he ſhould get his life without yielding in the leaſt.' He told them alſo, that, when he was firſt taken and brought before the council, he intended to wave them, and not be poſitive in his anſwers; but that he was ſo filled with darkneſs of ſpirit, that he durſt not continue in theſe reſolutions, but found himſelf obliged to be plain and free, as he had always been in his ſermons, in which he had found great peace.

On Wedneſday the 8th of February he appeared before the juſticiary, and, when his indictment was read, the juſtice clerk aſked him, if he adhered to his former confeſſion, and acknowleged all that was in his libel. He anſwered, All, except where it is ſaid, I have caſt off all fear of God; that I deny; for it is becauſe I fear to offend God, and violate his law, that I am here ſtanding ready to be condemned.' Then he was interrogated if he owned authority, and king James VII. to be his lawful ſovereign. He replied, 'I own all authority that hath its preſcriptions and limitations from the word of God; but cannot own this uſurper as lawful king, ſeeing, both by the word of God, ſuch an one is incapable to bear rule; and likewiſe by the ancient laws of the kingdom, which admit none to the crown of Scotland until he ſwear to defend the proteſtant religion, which a man of his profeſſion could not do.' They urged, Could he deny him to be king? Was he not the late king's brother? Had the late king any children lawfully begotten? Was he not declared to be ſucceſſor by act of parliament? He anſwered, he was, no queſtion, king de facto, but not de jure: that he was brother to the other, he knew nothing to the contrary. What children the other had he did not know; but from the word of God, that ought to be the rule of all laws, or from the ancient laws of the kingdom, it could not be ſhewn that he had, or ever could have, any right.' Then they aſked, if he owned, and had taught it to be unlawful to pay ceſſes and taxes to his majeſty. He replied, 'For the preſent ceſs, exacted for the preſent uſurper, I hold it unlawful to pay it, both in regard it is oppreſſive to the ſubjects, for the maintenance of tyranny, and becauſe it is impoſed for ſuppreſſing the goſpel. Would it have been thought lawful for the Jews, in the days of Nebochadnezzar, to have brought every one a coal to augment the flame of the furnace to devour the three children, if ſo they had been required by that tyrant? And how can it be lawful, either to oppreſs poor people for not bowing to the idols the king ſets up, or for their brethren to contribute to what may help forward their oppreſſion?' Next, they enquired if he owned that he had taught his hearers to come armed to their meetings, and, in caſe of oppoſition, to reſiſt. He anſwered, 'It were inconſiſtent with reaſon and religion both to do otherwiſe. Yourſelves would do it in the like circumſtances. I own that I taught them to carry arms to defend themſelves, and to reſiſt your unjuſt violence.' Farther, they aſked if he owned the note-book with the two ſermons in it, and that he had preached them. He ſaid, 'If you have added nothing, I will own it, and am ready to ſeal all the truths contained therein with my blood.' All his confeſſions being read over, he was required to ſubſcribe them. He ſaid he could not do it, ſince he looked upon that as a partial owning of their authority, After ſeveral times refuſing, he ſaid, with proteſtation. 'I will ſubſcribe the paper, as it is my teſtimony; but not in obedience to you.'

Next thoſe of the jury were called in by fives and ſworn, againſt whom he made no objection, but proteſted, 'That none might ſit on his aſſize that profeſſed proteſtant or preſbyterian principles, or an adherence to the covenanted work of reformation.' He was brought in guilty, and ſentence was paſſed, that he ſhould be executed in the Graſs-market on the Friday following. Lord Linlithgow, juſtice-general, aſked if he deſired longer time. He anſwered, that it was all one to him; if it was protracted, it was welcome; if it was ſhortened, it was welcome; his Maſter's time was the beſt. So he was returned to priſon.

Though none who ſuffered in the former part of this diſmal period ſpoke with greater freedom and oppenneſs than Mr Renwick, yet none were treated with ſo much moderation. The lenity of the juſticiary was much admired beyond their ordinary: for they admitted him to ſay what he pleaſed, without threatenings or interruptions, even though he gave none of them the title of lord but Linlithgow, who was a nobleman by birth.

It is farther remarkable, that, without his knowledge, and againſt his will, nay, after his open refuſing to the advocate to deſire it, he was reprieved till the 17th day, which gave occaſion to ſeveral to renew their reproaches.

Though Mr Renwick's friends (which was not uſual after ſentence) were denied acceſs, yet both papiſts, Epiſcopalians, and others, were permitted to ſee him. Biſhop Paterſon often viſited him; nay, he ſought another reprieve for him, which would eaſily have been granted, had he only petitioned for it. The biſhop aſked him, 'Think you none can be ſaved but thoſe of your principles? Will you kill yourſelf with your own hands, ſeeing you may have your life upon ſo eaſy terms?' He anſwered, 'I never ſaid nor thought that none could be ſaved except they were of thoſe principles; but theſe are truths which I ſuffer for, and which I have not raſhly concluded on, but deliberately, and of a long time have been confirmed that they are ſufficient points to ſuffer for.' The biſhop took his leave, declaring his ſorrow for his being ſo tenacious, and commended him for a youth of parts. The night before he ſuffered he ſignified his readineſs to ſerve him to the utmoſt of his power. Mr Renwick thanked him for his civility; but knew nothing he could do, or that he could deſire. Mr MacNaught, one of the curates, made him a viſit in his canonical habit, which Mr Renwick did not like. The curate, among other things, aſked his opinion concerning the toleration, and thoſe that accepted it. Mr Renwick declared that he was againſt the toleration; but as for the men that embraced it, he judged them to be godly men. Sir D. Dalrymple the advocate, ſeveral popiſh prieſts, and ſome of the gentlemen of the guard, together with ſome of the tolerated miniſters, were permitted to converſe with him. The prieſts, at leaving him, were overheard, ſaying that he was a moſt obſtinate heretic. All the time he was in priſon after his ſentence, he was kept ſo cloſe that he could get nothing wrote. His begun teſtimony, which he was writing, was taken from him, and pen, ink, and paper refuſed. However, he got a ſhort paper wrote the night before he ſuffered, which is in the Cloud of Witneſſes.

On Tueſday the 14th he was brought before the council on account of the informatory vindication; but what paſſed there cannot be learned, farther than their ſignifying how much kindneſs they had ſhewn him, in that they had reprieved him without his ſupplication, a thing never done before. He returned with extraordinary cheerfulneſs, rejoicing that he was counted worthy to ſuffer ſhame for the name of his Maſter. He was much in obſerving the goodneſs of God in reſtraining the perſecutors from putting him to torture. Being aſked what he thought God would do with the remnant left behind him; he anſwered, 'It ſhall be well with them; for God will not forſake nor caſt off his inheritance.'

On the day of his execution, the chief jailor begged, that, at the place of his execution, he would not mention the cauſe of his death, and would forbear all reflections. Mr Renwick told him, that what God would give him to ſpeak, that he would ſpeak, and nothing elſe, and nothing leſs. The jailor told him, he might ſtill have his life if he would but ſign that petition which he offered him. He anſwered, 'That he never read in ſcripture, or hiſtory, where martyrs petitioned for their lives when called to ſuffer for truth, though they might require them not to take their

their life, and remonſtrate againſt the wickedneſs of murdering them; but, in the preſent circumſtances, he judged it would be found a receding from the truth, and declining a teſtimony for Chriſt.'

At laſt his mother and ſiſters had liberty to ſee him. He took a refreſhment with them, and, in returning thanks, ſaid, 'O Lord, now thou haſt brought me within two hours of eternity, and this is no matter of terror to me, more than if I were to lie down in a bed of roſes; nay, through grace, to thy praiſe I may ſay, I had never the fear of death ſince I came to this priſon, but from the place I was taken I could have gone very compoſedly to the ſcaffold. O! how can I contain the thoughts of this, to be within two hours of the crown of glory.' He exhorted them much to prepare for death, expreſſing his own joyful aſſurance of endleſs glory; and, perceiving his mother weep, he exhorted her to remember, 'that they who loved any thing better than Chriſt were not worthy of him. If ye love me, rejoice that I am going to my Father, to obtain the enjoyment of what eye hath not ſeen, ear hath not heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive.' Then he went to prayer, wherein he run out much into praiſes, and pleaded in behalf of the ſuffering remnant, that the Lord would raiſe up witneſſes that might tranſmit the teſtimony to ſucceeding generations, and that the Lord would not leave Scotland; aſſerting, with great confidence of hope, that he was ſtrengthened in the faith of it, that the Lord would be gracious to Scotland.

When the drum beat he fell into a tranſport, ſaying, 'Yonder the welcome warning to my marriage, the Bridegroom is coming, I am ready, I am ready.' Then, after having in a moving way parted with his mother and ſiſters, he was taken, as uſual, to the low council houſe, where they deſired he would ſpeak what he had to ſay there. He told them, I have nothing to ſay to you, but that which is written in Jer. xxvi. 14, 15. 'As for me behold I am in your hand, &c. He was told that the drums would beat at the ſcaffold all the time, and therefore they adviſed him to pray there, which he refuſed, and declared that he would not be limited in what he would ſay; that he had premeditated nothing, but would ſpeak what was given him. They offered him any miniſter to be with him; but he choſe to be attended by one friend who was then in company.

He went to the place of execution, with great cheerfulneſs, in the midſt of an innumerable multitude, which was the greater, that executions had not been ſo frequent of late. There was a curate near the ſcaffold who tempted him, ſaying, Mr Renwick, own our king, and we ſhall pray for you. He replied that he wanted none of his prayers, ſince he was come to bear his teſtimony againſt him, and ſuch as he was. The curate ſaid, Own our king, and pray for him, whatever you ſay againſt us. His anſwer was, I will diſcourſe no more with you. I am, within a little, to appear before him who is King of kings, and Lord of lords, who will ſhortly pour ſhame, contempt, and confuſion on all the kings of the earth who have not ruled for him. He ſang Pſal. ciii. read Rev. xix. and then prayed, recommending his ſoul to God through the Redeemer, and his cauſe to be vindicated in his own time. He declared that this was the moſt joyful day he ever ſaw, a day he had greatly longed for, and bleſſed the Lord who had honoured him with the crown of martyrdom, an honour which the angels are not capable of. He complained of his being diſturbed in worſhipping God; but, ſaid he, 'I ſhall be above thoſe clouds; then ſhall I enjoy thee, and glorify thee without interruption or intermiſſion for ever.' Prayer being ended, he ſpoke to the people, and what was remembered is as follows.

SPectators, (or, if there be any of you auditors,) I muſt tell you, I am come here this day to lay down my life for adhering to the truths of Chriſt, for which I am neither afraid nor aſhamed to ſuffer; nay, I bleſs the Lord that ever counted me worthy, or enabled me to ſuffer any thing for him; and I deſire to praiſe his grace that he hath not only kept me free from the grois pollutions of the time, but alſo from the many ordinary pollutions of children; and for ſuch as I have been ſtained with, he hath waſhed and cleanſed me from them in his own blood. I am this day to lay down my life for theſe three things. 1. For diſowning the uſurpation and tyranny of James duke of York. 2. For preaching that it was unlawful to pay the ceſs expreſsly exacted for bearing down the goſpel. 3. For teaching that it was lawful for people to carry arms for defending themſelves in their meetings for the perſecuted goſpel-ordinances. I think a teſtimony for theſe is worth many lives; and if I had ten thouſand I would think it little enough to lay them all down for the ſame.

Dear friends, ſpectators, if any of you be auditors, I muſt tell you I die a preſbyterian proteſtant. I own the word of God as the rule of faith and manners. I own the Confeſſion of Faith, Larger and Shorter Catechiſms, Sum of ſaving knowledge, Directory for public and family worſhip, Covenants national and ſolemn league, Acts of general aſſemblies, and all the faithful contendings that have been for the covenanted reformation. I leave my teſtimony approving the preaching in the fields, and the defending the ſame by arms. I adjoin my teſtimony to all thoſe truths that have been ſealed by bloodſhed, either on ſcaffolds, fields, or ſeas, for the cauſe of Chriſt, I leave my teſtimony againſt popery, prelacy, eraſtianiſm, &c. againſt all profanity, and every thing contrary to ſound doctrine and the power of godlineſs; particularly againſt all uſurpations and encroachments made upon Chriſt's rights, the Prince of the kings of the earth, who alone muſt bear the glory of ruling his own kingdom the church; and, in particular, againſt this abſolute power uſurped by this uſurper, that belongs to no mortal, but is the incommunicable prerogative of Jehovah, and againſt his toleration flowing from this abſolute power.'

Here he was ordered to have done. He anſwered, I have near done; and then ſaid, 'Ye that are the people of God, do not weary to maintain the teſtimony of the day in your ſtations and places; and, whatever ye do, make ſure an intereſt in Chriſt; for there is a ſtorm coming that ſhall try your foundation. Scotland muſt be rid of Scotland before the delivery come. And you that are ſtrangers to God, break off your ſins by repentance, elſe I will be a ſad witneſs againſt you in the day of the Lord.

Here they ſtopt him, and made him go up the ladder, where he prayed; and this expreſſion was diſtinctly heard, 'Lord, I die in the faith that thou wilt not leave Scotland, but that thou wilt make the blood of thy witneſſes to be ſeed of thy church, and return again and be glorious in our land. And now, Lord, I am ready, the bride, the Lamb's wife, hath made herſelf ready.' When the napkin was tying round his face, he ſaid to his attending friend, 'Farewell, be diligent in duty, make your peace with God, through Chriſt; there is a great trial coming. As to the remnant I leave, I have committed them to God. Tell them from me not to weary, nor be diſcouraged in maintaining the teſtimony, Let them not quit or forego one of theſe deſpiſed truths. Keep your ground, and the Lord will provide you teachers and miniſters. And when he comes he will make theſe deſpiſed truths glorious in the earth.' Then he was turned over with theſe words in his mouth, 'Lord, into thy hands I commit my ſpirit: for thou haſt redeemed me, Lord God of truth.'

Thus died Mr James Renwick, the laſt that ſealed the teſtimony for religion and liberty, and the covenanted work of reformation, againſt popery, prelacy, eraſtianiſm, and tyranny in this period, a young man and miniſter, being juſt turned his 26th year, but a ripe chriſtian and martyr of Chriſt.

After his death the reverend Mr Alexander Shields ſucceeded and preached in the fields, and in April had a very numerous field meeting upon Diſtinkcorn-hill, which occaſioned many ſearches to be made by the ſoldiers for thoſe who were preſent. But to return.

On the 13th of February the reverend Mr John Hardy, miniſter at Gordon, was tried before the juſticiary for high treaſon; but the proceſs was dropt. The great crime was his preaching againſt popery, and warning his hearers of the danger they and the whole nation were in. This was conſtructed to be high treaſon.

On the 17th Sir George MacKenzie was reſtored to his place of being lord advocate, and Sir John Dalrymple was made juſtice clerk and a lord of ſeſſion. In March ſome country people were brought in priſoners, and examined by by Sir George about owning the king's authority; but though they owned it only with limitations, yet the new advocate was more eaſy with them than he had been with others in former years. But to proceed to things of a more public concern.

On the 27th of April king James iſſued out another declaration for liberty of conſcience in England, which the reader may ſee in the Engliſh hiſtorians. This declaration, ſays Dr. Welwood, was of a much higher ſtrain than the former, and in it the Roman Catholics were chiefly included, and indeed it was for their ſake alone it was granted. However, the king not being ſatisfied with having this publiſhed in the uſual method, emitted an order of council, enjoining the biſhops to cauſe it to be ſent and diſtributed throughout their ſeveral and reſpective dioceſſes, to be read at the uſual time of divine ſervice in all churches and chapels. Though 'ſome of the biſhops,' ſays Burnet, 'carried their compliance to a ſhameful pitch,' the generality of the clergy refuſed to obey ſo unjuſt a command, and ſeven of them, on account of a petition they preſented to his majeſty, praying that he would not inſiſt upon their diſtributing and reading the ſaid declaration, were committed to the tower, where we muſt leave them for ſome time.

Mean while, that matters might correſpond in Scotland with thoſe in England, on the 15th of May a new proclamation was publiſhed there, called the 4th indulgence, in which he pleads ſeveral acts of parliament, eſpecially the 2d act of his parliament there for acting by virtue of abſolute power; ſo that he pretended to law in diſpenſing with the ſtanding laws of the nations. Then he repeats his former proclamations, and ſignifies that he has diſſolved all judicatories and magiſtrates in royal burghs, and declares that he will maintain all his former proclamations, and threatens thoſe who would not comply with his meaſures.

But, notwithſtanding all this pretended liberty of conſcience, yet in many places all methods were taken to hinder preſbyterian miniſters from reaping the benefit of it, as appears not only from ſome inſtances already given, but alſo from the caſe of the reverend Mr Thomas Cobham, who was born in Dundee, and came thither on the 23d of May to ſee his friends. He performed family worſhip at his couſin's, for which he was brought before one of the magiſtrates, on pretence of his keeping a conventicle; but was preſently bailed, elſe he muſt have gone to priſon. Next day the information being found falſe, his bail-bond was given up, and he gave in his name to the magiſtrates, and preached the Sabbath following; but the Saturday after he was called, at ten at night, before ſome of the magiſtrates, and ordered to find bail, though they had nothing to lay to his charge; and, becauſe his friend Mr Smith took upon him to ſpeak in his favour, and remonſtrate againſt this illegal proceeding, he was ſent along with him to priſon. Though Mr Smith was let out, yet Mr Cobham was kept a priſoner till July, when he was ſent to Edinburgh, where, after ſome farther confinement, he was releaſed by the council, they finding nothing againſt him.

On the 10th of June, while the biſhops were in the tower, and the princeſs Anne at the Bath, the queen was ſaid to be delivered of a prince of Wales; but there were ſo many circumſtances that rendered this birth ſuſpicious, that the nation in general looked upon it as an impoſture, and as the laſt efforts of the papiſts to ruin the reformation in theſe lands. The illuſtrious prince of Orange, in his declaration for Scotland, ſpeaks of this in the following terms: 'But, to crown all, there are great and violent preſumptions inducing us to believe that thoſe evil counſellors, in order to their carrying on of their ill deſigns, and to the gaining to themſelves more time for the effecting of them, for the encouraging of their accomplices, and the diſcouraging of all good ſubjects, have publiſhed that the queen hath brought forth a ſon, though there have appeared, both during the queen's pretended bigneſs, and in the manner in which the birth was managed, ſo many juſt and viſible grounds of ſuſpicion, that not only we ourſelves, but all the good ſubjects of thoſe kingdoms, do vehemently ſuſpect that the pretended prince of Wales was not born by the queen. And it is notoriouſly known to all the world, that many both doubted of the queen's bigneſs and the birth of the child, and yet there was not one thing done to ſatisfy them, or put an end to their doubts.'

On the 14th the council of Scotland, conſidering that 'it having pleaſed the Almighty God, by whom kings reign, to bleſs his ſacred majeſty, our auguſt and glorious monarch, and in him us, his dutiful and happy ſubjects, with the birth of the moſt ſerene and high born prince, the prince and Stuart of Scotland, &c. by his royal conſort our gracious queen Mary,'——made an act appointing the 21ſt of June for the dioceſs of Edinburgh, and the 18th for the reſt of the kingdom, to be obſerved as days of ſolemn thankſgiving. The day was obſerved at Edinburgh with all ſolemnity.

About the 20th of June they of the united ſocieties, having been informed that Mr David Houſtoun, who had joined with Mr Renwick, had been apprehended, a good number of them aſſembled in arms, attacked the ſoldiers who were carrying him to Edinburgh, and after killing ſome, and wounding others, reſcued the priſoner; and, if they had not, it is very probable he would have ſuffered as Mr Renwick had done. The ſocieties afterwards, having informations againſt him, turned him out from amongſt them.

The news of this reſcue coming to Edinburgh, the council iſſued a proclamation on the 22d, ordering the nobility, freeholders heritors, and indulged miniſters, in the ſhires of Ayr, Lanerk, Renfrew, and Nithſdale, to be aſſembled on the 29th inſtant, and thoſe of Wigtoun on the 6th of July, in order to find out thoſe concerned in the ſaid reſcue; but, after all the inquiry that could be made, few or none concerned were found out, though the country was brought to no ſmall trouble on account of thoſe meetings.

Some time in June, John Reid a trooper, once belonging to Craigie's troop, finding one George Wood, a youth of about 16 years of age, ſhot him on the place. When Reid was challenged for this, he ſaid, he knew him to be a whig, and theſe ought to be ſhot where-ever they were found.

In June or July Claverhouſe and colonel Douglas made a moſt violent ſearch in Edinburgh. Every private ſoldier had power to examine, upon oath, all ſuſpected perſons, and whoever refuſed to renounce the covenants were forced to priſon.

The followers of the late Mr Renwick ſtill kept up their ſocieties. Accordingly, at a general meeting on the firſt of Auguſt, they collected near L. 240 Sterling in order to ranſom ſeveral of their brethren who were ſold for ſlaves to Barbadoes. Accordingly James Douglas, Thomas Brown, John Buchanan, Alexander Bailie, George Paton, John White, Gilbert MacCulloch, R. Mitchel, John White, George White, Agnes Keir, James Baxter, and another, were, in conſequence of this, actually relieved. But it is proper to take a ſhort view of what was tranſacting at this time in England.

The aſſurance of a popiſh ſucceſſor filled the king with hopes of accompliſhing his deſigns, and, in order to get a parliament to his mind, cloſeting was once more put in practice, promiſes and threatenings were made uſe of, ſome entire regiments were ordered from Ireland, and many vacancies in the Engliſh regiments were filled up with Iriſh and popiſh officers; and, during the public rejoicings for the birth of the pretended prince of Wales, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the biſhops of St Aſaph, Bath and Wells, Ely, Chicheſter, Peterborough, and Briſtol, were brought to their trials at the king's-bench bar on the 15th of June; but, upon a motion for a delay, the matter was put off till the 29th, and in the mean time they were ſet at liberty upon their recognizance. On the ſaid 29th Weſtminſter-hall was crouded with great numbers of lords, gentlemen, and others. The biſhops were tried, and the trial laſted ten hours; then the jury withdrew, and, after ſitting up all night, brought in their verdict, next morning, Not guilty.

Upon this the marquis of Hallifax, waving his hat over his head, cried, Huzza! The lords and gentlemen took the ſhout from him. It in an inſtant filled the whole hall with the loudeſt acclamations of joy, which were immediately taken by the crouds waiting in Palace yard and in Weſtminſter, from whence it was carried through the city of London and places adjacent, and, as faſt as it could fly, over the whole kingdom. The ſoldiers encamped on Honſlow heath gave ſuch an univerſal ſhout, that it ſtartled the king, then at an entertainment in the earl of Feverſham's tent, whom he ſent to know what was the matter. Feverſham coming back, told the king it was nothing but the ſoldiers ſhooting upon the news of the biſhops being acquitted. The king ſtamped with his foot, and ſaid, Do you call that nothing? But ſo much the worſe for them. A proteſtant roar like this could not be agreeable to his majeſty.

All true proteſtants, being now convinced that they were on the very brink of ruin, had no other expedient but to apply to the prince of Orange. Accordingly ſeveral great men, upon ſundry pretences, both from England and Scotland, repaired to the Hague to confer with his highneſs; and in July, one flight brought over to England about 80 letters from perſons of quality and credit, and carried back anſwers to the Hague. Many of the biſhops and clergy of England began now to forget the principles of paſſive obedience and non reſiſtance. The prince readily embarked in the quarrel, and the ſtates cheerfully agreed to give their aſſiſtance, for they were equally concerned in the affair with the Engliſh themſelves, becauſe the ruin of Holland would doubtleſs have ſoon followed the ſlavery of Great Britain.

While matters were thus concerting for reſcuing the nation from popery and ſlavery, the managers in Scotland did what they could to oppoſe them. Accordingly, on the 15th of Auguſt, the council publiſhed a proclamation againſt the following books and pamphlets, viz. all tranſlations of Buchanan de jure regni, Lex Rex, Jus populi, Naphtali, the Cup of Cold Water, the Scots Miſt, the Apologetical Relation, Mene Tekel, the Hind let looſe, the treaſonable proclamations iſſued out at Sanquhar, and thoſe iſſued out by the late duke of Monmouth and the late earl of Argyll. All were ordered to bring in theſe books by a limited time, under ſevere penalties. At Edinburgh ſeveral went in the council's name through the bookſellers ſhops, and not only ſeized theſe, but alſo whatever books were wrote againſt popery, alledging that the vending of theſe tended to alienate the people's minds from his majeſty. Either the advocate, or ſome other of the counſellors, went to the ſhop of a firm whig, and aſked him if he had any prohibited books. The bookſeller deſired him to ſearch; which having done, and found nothing, he aſked him if he had any books againſt popery; he anſwered he had a great many. The counſellor told him that was the king's religion, and that ſubjects ought not to be alienated from him on that account, and deſired to ſee them. Upon which the bookſeller directed him to the place where his bibles lay; and he, taking up one after another, ſaid, Theſe are bibles. 'They are ſo,' ſaid the bookſeller, 'and from the one end to the other are all againſt popery.' This was reckoned ſuch a high crime, that the bookſeller in the afternoon was ſummoned before the council, and brought to ſome trouble.

The preparations making in Holland being by this time pretty much talked of, and the king receiving repeated advices of them, he judged it convenient to flatter the people with the expectation of a parliament. Accordingly, on the 24th of Auguſt, he declared in council his intention to call a parliament for the 27th of November; and the chancellor had orders to iſſue forth writs on the 5th of September. But that was not done, the king only deſigning to amuſe the public. In the mean time the marquis of Aſboville at the king's command, preſented a memorial to the ſtates, to demand what they meant by their warlike preparations at this time; to which they gave ſuch an anſwer as made James begin to think of taking ſuch meaſures as were neceſſary for his own defence.

The council in Scotland, being compoſed of men hearty in his ſervice, on the 18th of September publiſhed a proclamation for rendezvouzing the militia in ſeveral ſhires, ſetting up of beacons in ſeveral places, to give notice when any number of ſhips were ſeen on the coaſts, and for ordering the heritors, lifeſcutters, and others to be ready, with their beſt horſes and arms, to attend the king's hoſt when deſired.

Though the king had promiſed to iſſue out writs for a new parliament, yet he was not ſo good as his word; however, he ſtill continued to amuſe the people with the hopes of it. Accordingly, on the 21ſt of September, he emitted a proclamation, wherein 'he thought fit to declare, that it was his royal purpoſe to endeavour a legal eſtabliſhment of an univerſal liberty of conſcience for all his ſubjects, as was alſo his reſolution inviolably to preſerve the church of England, by ſuch a confirmation of the ſeveral acts of uniformity, that they ſhould never be altered any other ways than by repealing the ſeveral clauſes which inflict penalties upon perſons not promoted, or to be promoted, to any eccleſiaſtical benefices within the meaning of the ſaid acts.——And that, for the farther ſecuring not only the church of England, but the proteſtant religion in general, he was willing the Roman Catholics ſhould remain incapable to be members of the houſe of commons.'

But this proclamation was too obſcure and ambiguous to produce any great effect; for his repealing the penal laws, and at the ſame time preſerving the acts of uniformity, implied a contradiction. Beſides the king only ſpoke of excluding papiſts from the houſe of commons, but not from the houſe of lords.

At laſt the king had unqueſtionable aſſurances that the preparations making in Holland were againſt him; upon which he turned pale, and for a while remained ſpeechleſs; and, ſays a modern hiſtorian, may not one now imagine the injured ghoſts of Ruſſel, Sidney, Baillie, Cornſh, and the hecatombs in the weſt, and in Scotland, haunted his dreams amidſt the extremity of his diſtreſs and deſpair, &c.

In this fright he applied to the biſhops then in town for advice. They deſired time to conſult what was proper to be done in ſuch circumſtances. Mean while, on the 28th, he iſſued a proclamation, ſetting forth the advices he received of the prince's intended invaſion to conquer theſe kingdoms, and ſubdue them to a common power, which obliged him to recall his writs for electing members of parliament. A moſt unaccountable ſtep! for, had he known his own intereſt, he ſhould rather have haſtened the meeting of his parliament.

About this time he publiſhed his indemnity, out of which were excepted, Mr Andrew Fletcher, colonel Ramſey, Titus Oates, Dr Gilbert Burnet, &c. This pardon, it is ſaid, was drawn up by Jefferies; and, in the mean time, by ſeveral clauſes, it excepted the whole nation; but none regarded it; for the thunders of Whitehall were no more minded now than thoſe of the Vatican.

On the 3d of October the biſhops adviſed the king 'to put the management of the government into the hands of qualified perſons, to annul the eccleſiaſtical commiſſion, to ſet aſide all faculties and licences for papiſts to keep ſchools, to deſiſt from his diſpenſing power, to inhibit the four pretended vicars apoſtolical invading the eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction, to fill up the vacant biſhopries, to reſtore the charters, to call a free and regular parliament; and, above all, that his majeſty would be pleaſed to permit his biſhops to offer ſuch motives and arguments, as they truſted might, by God's grace, be effectual to perſuade his majeſty to return to the communion of the church of England.'

The ſame day the biſhops gave the king this good advice, the Scots council ſent up an offer of their lives and fortunes, and aſked advice how to behave on this occaſion; for which they had the royal thanks, and were deſired to impriſon all ſuſpected perſons; and, ſince he had ordered the regular forces there to repair to England, he left it to them to raiſe ſuch as they ſhould think fit, and to augment the garriſons, and to do all other things as they ſhould judge convenient. The ſame day the council ordered all the heritors to get ready their beſt horſes and men, and to aſſemble them at the time and in the places appointed in the proclamation; and on the 19th made an act concerning the deſerters from the militia, which I ſhall not trouble the reader with.

About this time the reverend Mr Charles Gordon was brought to no ſmall danger for not owning the legitimacy of the pretended prince of Wales. This Mr Gordon was then miniſter at Campvere in Zealand, and after the revo-

lation miniſter firſt at Dalmenie, and after that at Aſhkirk, a gentleman of unaffected piety and ſolid learning. He came to Scotland in Auguſt to ſee his friends in the north. He repaired to Edinburgh, in his way to Campvere, in September. In the beginning of October, when there was great noiſe about the prince of Orange's intended expedition, the council emitted a proclamation, diſcharging all ſubjects to leave the kingdom without a licence from the council, or one of their number. Mr Gordon therefore applied, by a friend, to the regiſter for a paſs. The regiſter engaged to uſe his intereſt with lord Perth the chancellor, and, on the 12th of October, deſired Mr Gordon to attend in the parliament cloſe. When attending there the regiſter came out, and told him that he had quite forget his affair, but promiſed to mind it when he met with the chancellor at three o'clock in the treaſury.—— Mean while Mr Gordon went to the caſtle, and got the duke of Gordon to uſe his intereſt likewiſe. Both the duke and the regiſter ſpoke to the chancellor. Mr Gordon, all of a ſudden, was called in, and examined before the lords of the treaſury, and, among other things, he was interrogated as follows. Chancellor. Do you own the king's authority? Gordon. Yes, my lord. Ch. Have you preached ſince you came to the country? G. Yes. Ch. Do you pray for the prince of Wales? G. No. Ch. Why not for the prince of Wales? G. There is no particular order for praying for him, and I have not uſed to pray for all the particular branches of the royal family by form. Ch. It is no limiting the ſpirit to pray for all the branches of the royal family by form. G. My lord, I have not been uſed to pray by forms. Ch. Whom do you mean when you pray for the royal family? G. All the princes and princeſſes of the family. Ch. Do you not include and intend the prince of Wales? G. My lord, I do not exclude him. Ch. But do you not include him? Mr Gordon was ſilent, and the chancellor proceeded, ſaying, There is the matter. Sir, I perceive I have not been miſtaken and miſinformed concerning you, what for a man you are. G. I am ſorry if your lordſhip apprehend ill concerning me. Ch Do you not think that the king hath a ſon, or that the prince of Wales is heir to the crown? Mr Gordon was ſilent, Ch. Why do you not anſwer? Do you doubt of ſuch a thing? G. My lord, I do not meddle in theſe matters, nor am I a competent judge of them. After a few more queſtions Mr Gordon was diſmiſſed, and in an hour called in again, and required to ſign the following paper. 'I Mr Charles Gordon, miniſter of the goſpel at Campvere, do own and acknowledge the king's ſon, prince of Scotland and Wales, as apparent heir of the crown, and promiſes to pray for him as ſuch.' He refuſed to comply with this, ſaying, he could not in conſcience ſign it. Ch. What, do you pretend conſcience in refuſing to own the king's ſon as apparent heir? G. I cannot help my weakneſs; conſcience cannot be conſtrained. Ch. Whether or not, failing the prince of Wales, would ye acknowledge the princeſs of Orange as apparent heir of the crown? G. Yes, my lord. Ch. And why not the prince of Wales now? Mr Gordon was ſilent. In ſhort, they were very preſſing upon him to give his reaſons, but he ſtill declined. He was then removed, and, in a little, ſent up under a guard, and committed priſoner to the caſtle. However, it was not thought proper to keep him confined, and therefore, upon his begging to be ſet at liberty, and declaring, that if in any thing he was miſtaken, or had offended his lordſhip, he was ſorry for it, for he deſired to give no offence to Jew, nor Gentile, nor to the church of God, he was releaſed, and returned to his charge the beſt way he could. I ſhall only obſerve here, that had Mr Gordon been before the managers, ſome time ago, he had not got ſo eaſily off; but now their power was near a period.

By this time every body almoſt beginning to be taken with the propoſals made by his highneſs the prince of Orange, publiſhed in his excellent declaration for England, the king found it his intereſt to retract ſome of his arbitrary and deſpotic proceedings. Accordingly the biſhop of London's ſuſpenſion was taken off, the eccleſiaſtical commiſſion was diſſolved, the city-charter and the fellows of Magdalen-college were reſtored, and other illegal practices renounced; but, upon the news of the prince of Orange's fleet being diſperſed by a ſtorm, his majeſty put a ſtop to all further redreſs of grievances.

But the prince, having repaired his damages, put to ſea a ſecond time, on the 1ſt of November; and, after a remarkable paſſage, in which the wind almoſt miraculouſly favoured him, he landed at Torbay on the 5th, with about 14,000 men. What paſſed in England on this remarkable occaſion is particularly recorded by the Engliſh hiſtorians, and therefore I ſhall not inſert it here.

While theſe things were a-doing, the Scots biſhops, on the 3d of November, ſent a letter of a peculiar ſtile to the king, from whence the reader may ſee the difference between the Engliſh and the Scots biſhops; the ſubſtance of it is as follows.

May it pleaſe your moſt ſacred Majeſty.

WE proſtrate ourſelves to pay our moſt devout thanks and adoration to the ſovereign Majeſty of heaven and earth, for preſerving your ſacred life and perſon, ſo frequently expoſed to the greateſt hazards, and as often delivered, and you miraculouſly proſpered with glory and victory, in defence of the rights and honour of your majeſty's auguſt brother, and of theſe kingdoms; and that, by his merciful goodneſs, the raging of the ſea, and the madneſs of unreaſonable men, have been ſtilled and calmed, and your majeſty, as the darling of heaven, peaceably ſeated on the throne of your royal anceſtors, whoſe long, illuſtrious, and unparalleled line, is the greateſt glory of this your ancient kingdom. We pay our moſt humble gratitude to your majeſty for the repeated aſſurances of your royal protection to our national church and religion, as the laws have eſtabliſhed them.——We magnify the divine mercy in bleſſing your majeſty with a ſon, and us with a prince, whom we pray heaven may bleſs and preſerve to ſway your royal ſceptres after you; and that he may inherit, with your dominions, the illuſtrious and heroic virtues of his auguſt and moſt ſerene parents. We are amazed to hear of the danger of an invaſion from Holland, which excites our prayers for an univerſal repentance from all orders of men, that God may yet ſpare his people, preſerve your royal perſon, and prevent the effuſion of Chriſtian blood, and to give ſuch ſucceſs to your majeſty's arms, that all who invade your majeſty's juſt and undoubted rights,——may be diſappointed and clothed with ſhame; ſo that on your royal head the crown may ſtill flouriſh.' They conclude with profeſſions of unſhaken loyalty, and with wiſhing the king the hearts of his ſubjects, and the necks of his enemies; and they received a proper anſwer, which needs not be inſerted.

In conſequence of a letter from the king, dated November 5. the council iſſued a proclamation againſt ſpreading of falſe news, with a deſign to prevent the ſpreading of the prince's declarations; but it had now but little weight, the people being more fond to ſee theſe excellent papers.

The prince in his declaration for Scotland, among other things, ſays,——'The lamentable effects of an arbitrary power, and of evil counſels, are ſo manifeſt, in the deplorable ſtate of the kingdom of Scotland, that both our reaſon and conſcience do prompt us to an abhorrence of them. For when we conſider the ſad condition that nation, though always affectionate to the royal family, and governed for many ages, by laws made for the authority of their kings and of the eſtates of parliament, and by common cuſtoms, is reduced to, by endeavours—to change the conſtitution of the monarchy regulated by laws, into a deſpotic or arbitrary power, which doth evidently appear, not only by the actings of evil councellors in power, but by—public declaration, bearing that the king is an abſolute monarch, to whom obedience ought to be given in all things without reſerve, thereby to make way to introduce what religion they pleaſe.—Whilſt we conſider theſe things, as we cannot but be touched with a tender ſenſe of theſe miſeries, ſo the giving ſuch a remedy to them, as may——anſwer the expectation of all good men and true proteſtants, is the great thing which we propoſe to ourſelves in this undertaking.—

It is well known that the laws, privileges, and rights of the kingdom have been overturned,—and—what have been the arbitrary procedures of an encroaching privy-council;

cil; —for theſe evil councellors have ordered or ſuffered young noblemen to be taken from their relations, and to be ſent abroad to be inſtructed in jeſuits colleges, and have likewiſe cauſed ſchools to be erected under the conduct of popiſh prieſts, and that in the capital city of the kingdom.

In an open contempt alſo of the known laws of the kingdom, the papiſts are put into places of the higheſt truſt, both civil and military, and entruſted with all the forts and magazines. The rights and privileges of royal burghs, the third eſtate of parliament, having as many deputies in it as all the ſhires of the kingdom, are taken away, and they hindered in the free election of their magiſtrates —to the manifeſt violation of their charters eſtabliſhed by law and immemorial poſſeſſion; and all this done by mere arbitrary power, without any citation, trial, or ſentence.

And whereas no nation can ſubſiſt without the adminiſtration of good and impartial juſtice,—yet thoſe evil councellors have ſubjected theſe to an abſolute and deſpotic power, having turned out judges, who by law, ought to continue during life, or their good behaviour,—and put others in their place—without any regard to their abilities.——

By the influence of the ſame evil councellors hath a moſt exorbitant power been exerciſed, in impoſing bonds and oaths, in permitting free quarters to the ſoldiers,—in impriſoning gentlemen without any ſo much as alledged reaſon, forcing many to accuſe and witneſs againſt themſelves, impoſing arbitrary fines, frighting and haraſſing many parts of the country with intercommuning and juſtice-airs, or circuit-courts, making ſome incur forfeiture of life and fortune for the moſt general and harmleſs converſe, even with their neareſt relations outlawed,——impowering officers and ſoldiers to act upon the ſubjects—the greateſt barbarities, in deſtroying them, by hanging, ſhooting, and drowning them, without any form of law, or reſpect to age and ſex, not giving ſome of them time to pray to God for mercy; and this for no other reaſon, but becauſe they would not anſwer or ſatisfy them in ſuch queſtions as they propoſed to them, without any warrant of law, and againſt the common intereſt of mankind, which frees all men from being obliged to diſcover their ſecret thoughts; beſides a great many other violences and oppreſſions to which that poor nation hath been expoſed, without any hope of having an end put to them, or to have relief from them.'

The reſt of his highneſs's declaration, which is no mean confirmation of the proceeding part of this hiſtory, relates to their aboliſhing the penal laws, and then to take away the toleration to diſſenters, to the impoſture of the pretender, and his highneſs's intention to redreſs all their grievances; and therefore it is no wonder though it had a great influence on the moſt part of the nobility, gentry, and common people in Scotland, who very ſoon heartily declared themſelves for the prince.

After this there is very little concerning the proceedings of the managers in Scotland. The body of the nation hated them, and the ſurpriſing progreſs of the prince in England threw them into ſuch a conſternation, that they began to think how to provide, in the beſt manner, for their own ſafety. In ſeveral places the prince of Orange's declaration was publicly proclaimed, as at Glaſgow, Irvine, And Ayr, and moſt other burghs. The reverend Mr Lining in his preface to Mr Shield's tract on church communion, ſays, 'that the weſtern people encouraged this proclamation at Glaſgow before it was publiſhed in any other place in the kingdom, and that theſe people prayed publicly for the ſucceſs of his enterpriſe, even before he landed in England.' On the laſt of November the earl of Lowdoun, and ſeveral other young gentlemen, at that time ſtudents in the univerſity of Glaſgow, burnt the pope's effigy, together with the effigies of the archbiſhops of St. Andrews and Glaſgow, without any oppoſition.

In the beginning of December, the mob ſhewed a keenneſs of reſentment againſt popery at Edinburgh. When a popiſh meeting in the Canongate was diſmiſſing, ſome apprentices and others affronted them; information being given againſt them on Monday, ſome ſoldiers were ordered to apprehend them, and accordingly two ſervants of the bakers, with a woman, were taken up, and cruelly whipt from the tolbooth to the Abbay, then remitted to priſon, and afterwards baniſhed.

While the ſoldiers apprehended the laſt mentioned perſon, a ſtruggle was made by the apprentices, and one Alexander Keith a fencing maſter, happened to cry out to the young men, Lads, have you no ſwords? Next night he was taken out of bed, and, for theſe or the like words, was, a very few days after, hanged at the croſs. This, and ſome other things, exaſperated the people in ſuch a manner, that, to prevent riſings, guards were kept in twenty or thirty places of the town: and, as there were no regular forces, but an independent company under capt. Wallace at the Abbay, the reports of maſſacres and the like were ſpread, and the people greatly alarmed.

On Sabbath, December the 9th, ſome idle perſons, after walking in the park and St. Anthony's gardens, came to the Abbay to paſs that way as the neareſt road, but found all the avenues ſhut, and canon placed at every gate, and were charged by the centinels not to come near. This, with the report that the court was full of armed men, increaſed the jealouſies of the populace, and the fears of the more inconſiderate. In the evening ſome young men got together, and began to huzza; upon which the ſtudents and apprentices gathered at the college. The magiſtrates ordered all the gates of the city to be ſhut, and the keys to be delivered to provoſt Prince. The youths ſurrounded his houſe, and threatened to burn it if he refuſed the keys. From thence they marched to the croſs, broke open the doors, and proclaimed an offer of L. 400 Sterling to any who ſhould bring Perth or Melford dead or alive.

Next day, in the forenoon, the magiſtrates iſſued a proclamation againſt tumults. It was no ſooner read than the mob tore it in pieces. The chancellor and his family, ſeeing how matters were like to go, thought proper to retire. Matters continued quiet till towards the evening, when the mob gathered at the Cowgate, and marched down to the Netherbow; and, finding the Canongate guard friendly, they proceeded, and at the Canongate croſs took down the earl of Perth's picture, and carried it with them to the Abbay. Capt. Wallace advanced with ſome ſoldiers. This made them halt: however, they ſent to demand acceſs to the court; and, upon his refuſing, beat their drum, and, with a cry, run in upon him. He ordered his men to fire, by which ſome were killed, and ſeveral wounded. The apprentices, and the reſt, after ſuſtaining his fire, ruſhed in upon him, killed two of the ſoldiers, and forced the reſt to flee to the Abbay; the gates of which being preſently ſhut, they could get no farther at that time.

Upon this they retired a little, and ſent a detachment to take care of the dead and wounded, and to require farther aſſiſtance. This party carried with them ſome of the arms and hands of the dead and wounded, and ſhewed them to ſome gentlemen then at a vintner's in the city, who immediately applied to the magiſtrates for help, but were refuſed. This ſo exaſperated theſe commiſſioners from the apprentices, that they threatened to burn the town. At laſt, by the intereſt of the ſaid gentlemen, a quorum of the council ordered the magiſtrates to raiſe the trained bands, and ſent two heralds with them to require capt. Wallace to ſurrender and to uſe force if he ſhould refuſe.

The captain was ſummoned to ſurrender the abbay in the council's name; but, not thinking proper to yield, the town-guard and trained bands, commanded by captains Macgill and Graham, attacked him; and, after ſome firing on both ſides, captain Graham broke in by a back paſſage, which being obſerved by thoſe in the abbay, they fled, and thirty ſix were taken priſoners.

The youths, obſerving this, ruſhed in and killed all the ſoldiers they met with, to the number of about fourteen. Then they rifled the chapel and ſchools, brought the timber work, library, and whatever they could lay their hands on, and burnt them in the court. In like manner they ſerved the images, after carrying them in proceſſion through the ſtreets. They razed the new work in the church, turned up the marble pavement, rifled the Chancellor's apartments, and committed every thing to the flames.

Next

Next day, for there was no power to reſtrain them, they went through all the houſes of papiſts they could hear of, and required their books, beads, croſſes and images, which they ſolemnly burnt in the ſtreets. Next day a mob of common thieves got up and plundered ſeveral houſes, but that was ſoon over.

On the 14th of December the council met, and made an act, ordering the ſheriffs and other magiſtrates to ſearch the houſes of papiſts within their juriſdictions, and ſecure all arms and ammunition they ſhould find there; recommending to them to protect their perſons and houſes from public tumults and private inſults. On the 24th they made their laſt act, wherein they required all proteſtant-ſubjects to put themſelves in a poſture of defence, for ſecuring their religion, lives, liberties, and properties, and all heritors to repair to the head burghs of their reſpective ſhires and ſtewarties, to be rendezvouſed under proper perſons mentioned in the act; and now the reader cannot but obſerve a great alteration. The council had been haraſſing and perſecuting the ſubjects for 28 years paſt for that very thing which they now call them to: but the truth is, the managers had now loſt their power; they had no army to ſupport them, and, to uſe the words of a noted enemy to the revolution, (the earl of Balcarras,) 'they were forced to overlook what they had no force to ſuppreſs;' for, during the whole adminiſtration of the party, things were carried on by force.

The people in the weſtern counties ran immediately to arms. 'They thought (ſays biſhop Burnet) that the time was now come, not only to procure themſelves eaſe and liberty, but to revenge themſelves upon others. They generally broke in upon the epiſcopal clergy with great inſolence and much cruelty. They carried them about the pariſhes in mock proceſſion, tore their gowns, and drove them from their churches and houſes; nor did they treat thoſe of them who did appear zealouſly againſt popery with any diſtinction.' Theſe mobbing doings began on Chriſtmaſs-day 1688, and continued for ſeveral weeks; and it is certain the prelatical clergy ſuffered not a little. However, they have aggravated the matter beyond all the bounds of truth and modeſty, by repreſenting the outrages of thoſe weſtern tumults as ſuch, that even the French dragooning could not equal them: But the many lies and falſhoods they publiſhed upon this point have been ſufficiently expoſed by the reverend doctor Rule, and others.

I ſhall not pretend to vindicate what was done by mobs and tumults; but then I cannot help offering theſe following things to the conſideration of the reader. 1. The people who did theſe things were under the higheſt provocations, conſidering the ſufferings they had endured. How many of them had loſt fathers, mothers, children, huſbands, and wives, during the period of the late tyrannical adminiſtration? 2. Thoſe miniſters, or curates, as they were called, who now felt a little of their reſentment had not only been intruded on the people without their conſent, but were the chief inſtruments of the moſt horrid perſecutions and barbarities that people had endured: And, as 'oppreſſion makes a wiſe man mad,' was it any wonder though it made a provoked mob ruſh into ſome practices that are not to be juſtified in any civilized Chriſtian nation? It is rather ſurpriſing that they did not carry their reſentments much higher. 3. Theſe things were acted in an interregnum, when there was neither civil nor eccleſiaſtical government. One king had run away, another was not yet eſtabliſhed, matters were all in confuſion; and, the poor people being now able to ſhake off the intollerable yoke they had long groaned under, can we think it ſtrange that they relieved themſelves, when there was none elſe that either could or would? But ſuppoſe unjuſtifiable violences were committed by theſe tumults what is that to the church? It was done by no act either of church or ſtate. But, not to inſiſt farther on this.

While theſe things were a doing in Scotland, the king withdrew to France; the Prince of Orange was put to poſſeſſion of the government of England; the chancellor the earl of Perth had reſigned, ſeveral Scots noblemen and gentlemen had gone to London to deſire a free parliament. On the 7th of January 1689, his highneſs aſſembled ſuch of the Scots lords and gentlemen as were there, and aſked their advice what was to be done for the ſecuring the proteſtant religion, and reſtoring their laws and liberties according to his declaration. The prince then retired, and they went to the council-chamber at White hall, and, having choſe the duke of Hamilton their preſident, agreed upon an addreſs to his highneſs. As they were going to break up at that time, the earl of Arran, ſon to the duke of Hamilton, propoſed that they ſhould move the prince of Orange to deſire the king to return and call a free parliament; however it was unanimouſly rejected, and by none more than by his own father. Next day they met in the ſame place, and agreed upon an addreſs thanking his highneſs for his pious and generous undertaking, and deſiring him to take upon him the adminiſtration of the government of Scotland, and ſummon a convention of eſtates to meet at Edinburgh on the 14th of March next; and that the electors and members of the ſaid meeting be proteſtants, without any other exception or limitation whatſoever. The addreſs was ſubſcribed by above 30 lords and about 80 gentlemen. The duke of Hamilton preſented it to the prince, who thanked them for it, and, on the 14th, ſignified his compliance with it, aſſuring them that they ſhould always find him ready to concur in every thing that may be found neceſſary for ſecuring the proteſtant religion, and reſtoring the laws and liberties of the nation. The earls of Crawford and Lothian, who came to town after the addreſs was preſented, waited on the prince, and deſired that they might be allowed to ſubſcribe it, which was granted.

In the mean time the lords and commons of England, having finiſhed their debates as to the vacancy of the throne, declared the prince and princeſs of Orange king and queen of England, France and Ireland; and they were accordingly proclaimed on the 13th of February, to the univerſal joy of all true and hearty proteſtants.

On the 3d of March the people of the weſtern ſhires had a large meeting at Leſmahago, where they renewed the national covenant, and, in a ſolemn manner, ſwore to ſtand in the defence of his highneſs the prince of Orange, his perſon and authority, when lawfully choſen and eſtabliſhed as king, or ſupreme magiſtrate over them; ſo that however they were enemies to tyranny, yet they were hearty friends to legal government.

On the 14th of march the convention of eſtates ſat down at Edinburgh; and it is well known that the members of it were of the beſt families and fortunes in the kingdom, and generally of as great piety and virtue as could be reaſonably expected after ſuch a debauched period. In the author of the memoirs of N Brit. p. 29. 32,. the reader may ſee a liſt of them. There was a very ſmall party of them that adhered to the intereſt of king James, as will preſently appear. The biſhop of Edinburgh ſaid prayers, and, being of the Tory ſtamp, he prayed for the ſafety and reſtoration of king James. The houſe then proceeded to chuſe a preſident; the Tory party were for the marquis of Athole, the Proteſtant party for the duke of Hamilton, who carried it by 40 votes; ſo that the whigs had a great majority before the biſhops and malecontent peers left the houſe.

As the duke of Gordon a papiſt, was in poſſeſſion of the caſtle of Edinburgh, the convention gave a warrant to the earls of Lothian and Tweddale to ſummon the duke to ſurrender. All the biſhops and diſcontented lords concurred in this vote, as they did in another next day, that he ſhould be proclaimed traitor, and the caſtle blocked up. And now, as the duke had king James's commiſſion in his pocket, the reader is to judge, whether theſe paſſive-obedience gentlemen did not act inconſiſtent with their principles, and the intereſt of their abdicated maſter; however, this is, and has always been the way of Jacobites. But I muſt haſten to a concluſion.

The meeting had a letter from king James delivered to them two days after they met; and the earl of Leven brought them another letter from king William. Then it was debated which ſhould be read firſt; but king William's carried it by a great majority) and, before the other letter was read, it was enacted, That, notwithſtanding any thing contained in it, they ſhould proceed, till they had ſettled the proteſtant religion, the government, laws, and liberties of the kingdom. This was ſigned by ſeven or eight of the biſhops, and all the Jacobite and Tory members, ſix or ſeven only accepted. How inconſiſtent this was with the ſcots biſhops letter to king James, (p. 475.), muſt be left with the reader. Not a member of the houſe moved for an anſwer to king James's letter. ſo little did they regard his threatenings, of which it was full; but, on the 23d, they returned a dutiful anſwer to that of king William, in which they congratuled his majeſty for the ſucceſs of his undertakings, thanked him for taking upon him the adminiſtration of public affairs, and aſſured him that they would come ſpeedily to proper reſolutions for eſtabliſhing the government, laws, and liberties, upon ſolid foundations, and agreeable to the general good and inclinations of the people.

On the 26th of March a committee was named for ſettling the government, conſiſting of nine lords, nine knights, and nine gentlemen. The biſhops were excluded; for the houſe was ſo jealous of them, that they ordered them not to inſinuate in their prayers any thing againſt their acts and proceedings; for they had juſtly offended the generality of the ſtate by their former compliance with king James's arbitrary government, by their prayers at the beginning of the ſeſſion, and other things that diſcovered their diſſatisfaction to king William, and the ſettlement now to be made.

During the conſultations of this committee, ſome Scots regiments under the command of Gen. MacKay, came from England; whereupon the convention, on the 28th of March, agreed that the earl of Leven, who was one of thoſe noblemen that came over with the prince of Orange, ſhould return their thanks to the people, who came upon their own charges from the weſt to guard the convention, and to diſmiſs them, and ſuffer them to return to their reſpective habitations with their arms. It appears, from the act of the convention, that theſe people, after they came to Edinburgh, were under the command of the ſaid lord Leven.

As theſe people, however reproached by their enemies, as the wild antimonarchical, enthuſiaſtic, lunatic, Cameronians, were among the firſt in Scotland who took up arms for the prince of Orange, ſo they were the firſt men in Scotland that addreſſed or petitioned the convention of eſtates to place the crown of Scotland on the head of their deliverer king William; from which it appears, that, though they were enemies to tyranny and arbitrary power, yet they were not enemies to legal government, or the conſtitution of their country. The tenor of their petition is as follows.

To the meeting of the eſtates of the kingdom of Scotland, viz. the noblemen, barons, and burgeſſes, lawfully called and choſen, now aſſembled at Edinburgh for eſtabliſhing the government, reſtoring and ſecuring the true religion, laws, and liberties of the ſaid kingdom,

The humble petition of the poor people who have ſuffered grievous perſecution for their religion, and for their revolt from and diſowning the authority of king James VII. pleading for devolving the government upon the prince of Orange, now king of England, Sheweth, &c.

Here they rehearſe the ſufferings of Scotland under the tyranny of king James VII. and proceed thus:

WE proſtrate ourſelves, yet under the ſorrowing ſmart of our ſtill bleeding wounds, at your honours feet, who have a call, a capacity, and, we hope a heart to heal us; and we offer this our petition enforced, and conjuring your honours to hearken to us.

By all the formerly felt, preſently ſeen, and, for the future, feared effects and efforts of popery and tyranny, by the cry of the blood of our murdered brethren, by the ſufferings of the baniſhed free born ſubjects of this realm now groaning in ſervitude, being ſold into ſlavery in the Engliſh plantations of America; by the miſeries that many thouſands forfeited, diſinherited, haraſſed and waſted houſes have been reduced to; by all the ſufferings of a faithful people, for adhering to the ancient covenanted eſtabliſhment of religion and liberty; and by all the arguments of juſtice, neceſſity, and mercy, that ever could join together, to begin communication among men of wiſdom, piety, and virtue.

Humbly beſeeching, requeſting, and craving of your honours, now, when God hath given you this opportunity to act for his glory, the good of his church, of the nation, your own honour, and the happineſs of poſterity; now, when this kingdom, the neighbouring, and all the nations of Europe have their eyes upon you, expecting you will acquit yourſelves like repreſentatives of a free nation, in redeeming it from ſlavery, otherwiſe inevitable, following the example of your renowned anceſtors, and the pattern of the preſent convention and parliament in England; that you will proceed, without any delay, to declare the wicked government diſſolved, the crown and throne vacant, and James VII. whom we never have owned, and reſolved, in conjunction with many thouſands of our countrymen, never again to own, to have really forfeited, and rightly to be deprived of all right and title he ever had, or could ever pretend to have thereto, and to provide that it may never be in the power of any ſucceeding ruler, to aſpire unto, or ariſe to ſuch a capacity of tyrannizing. Moreover, ſince anarchy and tyranny are equally to be deteſted, and the nation cannot ſubſiſt without a righteous governor, as alſo that none can have a nearer right, or fitter qualifications, than his illuſtrious highneſs the prince of Orange, who the Moſt High has ſingularly owned, and honoured to be our deliverer from popery and ſlavery; we cry therefore to your honours, and crave that king William, now proclaimed king of England, may be choſen and proclaimed alſo king of Scotland; and that the legal authority may be devolved upon him, with ſuch neceſſary proviſions and limitations as may give juſt and legal ſecurities for the peace and purity of religion, the ſtability of our laws, privileges of parliament, and liberties of the people, civil and eccleſiaſtic, and may thereby make our ſubjection both a clear duty and a comfortable happineſs. (Here they enlarge upon the king's being obliged to profeſs and preſerve the pure religion and the work of reformation, and conclude thus:) Upon ſuch terms as theſe we render our allegiance to king William, and hope to give more pregnant proofs of our loyalty to his majeſty, in adverſe, as well as in proſperous providences, than they have done, or can do, who profeſs implicit ſubjection to abſolute authority, ſo long only as providence preſerves its grandeur.

Here the reader may ſee how willing theſe people were to ſubmit to legal government, in oppoſition to tyranny and arbitrary power; and though they were accuſed of going heights and lengths, in diſowning the tyranny of the royal brothers, yet now the whole nation concur with them; nay, ſo hearty were theſe people, that, in one day, without the beat of drum, or expence of levy-money, they raiſed the earl of Angus's regiment of 800 men, and offered to complete two or three regiments more, if his majeſty ſhould have occaſion for them. The reverend Mr Linning ſays, that they muſtered in one day 1140 men; and it is well known what ſervice this regiment did both in Scotland and in Flanders. But I now return to the convention.

The committee above mentioned having come to a reſolution among themſelves, after a few days ſitting, reported it to the houſe. After the debate was over, the queſtion was put, whether the houſe agreed with the committee. It was carried in the affirmative by a great majority, there being only eight or nine negative voices, of whom ſeven were biſhops, and 13 or 14 non liquets, of whom two lords, one knight of the ſhire, and the reſt burgeſſes; ſo that the houſe came to the following reſolution.

"The eſtates of the kingdom of Scotland find and declare, that king James VII. being a profeſſed papiſt, did aſſume the royal power, and acted as king, without ever taking the oath required by law, and hath, by the advice of wicked and evil counſellors, invaded the fundamental conſtitutions of this kingdom, and altered it from a legal limited monarchy, to an abſolute and deſpotic power, and hath exerciſed the ſame to the ſubverſion of the proteſtant religion, and the violation of the laws and liberties of the nation, inverting all the ends of government, whereby he hath hath forfaulted the crown, and the throne is become vacant.' The reaſons for declaring the throne vacant, containing 15 articles, were read and debated article by article, and were explained by Sir John Dalrymple and Sir James Montgomery, with ſo much learning that they gave almoſt general ſatisfaction, none ſpeaking againſt them but the archbiſhop of Glaſgow, and Mr James Ogilvie afterwards earl of Findalater.

The convention having thus far proceeded, immediately ordered a bill to be brought in, 'to ſettle the crown on king William and queen Mary, and to conſider the terms of the deſtination of the heirs of the crown, and to prepare an inſtrument of government for ſecuring the people from their grievances.' When this vote was paſſed, and the bill ordered to be drawn, the biſhop of Dundee offered to ſay prayers. Upon this a member moved, that, king James being no more their king, he muſt pray for him at his peril. The cautious prelate thought proper to ſay only the Lord's prayer. Their majeſties were accordingly proclaimed king and queen of Scotland on the 11th of April, the ſame day they were crowned in England.

The inſtrument of government, or claim of right, the reader may ſee among the acts of that convention, and in my author's appendix, No 154. in which, among other things, it is declared, 'That by the laws of this kingdom no papiſt can be king or queen of this realm, nor bear any office whatſoever therein; nor can any proteſtant ſucceſſor exerciſe the regal power until he or ſhe ſwear the coronation oath.——That prelacy, and the ſuperiority of any office in the church above preſbyters, is, and hath been a great and inſupportable grievances and trouble to this nation, and contrary to the inclinations of the generality of the people, ever ſince the reformation, they having been reformed from papery by preſbyters, and therefore ought to be aboliſhed.'——

The act of ſettlement being thus paſſed, the convention ordered a dutiful letter to be drawn up, and ſent with it, in which a clauſe was put, at the motion of the earl of Crawford, of an humble requeſt to the king to turn that meeting of the eſtates into a parliament, and that the earl of Crawford was to preſide. This act was accordingly paſſed the ſame day, and the parliament was prorogued to the 17th.

The parliament ſat down on the 17th, and in July paſſed an act aboliſhing prelacy, which is as follows:——

'Whereas the eſtates of this kingdom, in their claim of right on the 11th of April laſt, declared that prelacy, &c. Our ſovereign Lord and lady, the king and queen's majeſties, do hereby aboliſh prelacy, and all ſuperiority of any office in the church above preſbyters in this kingdom: and hereby reſcind, caſs and annul the 11t act of the 2d ſeſſion of the 1ſt parliament of king Charles II. and the 2d act of the 3d ſeſſion of the 2d parliament of king Charles II. and the 4th act of the 3d parliament of king Charles II. and all other acts, ſtatutes, and conſtitutions, in ſo far only as they are inconſiſtent with this act, and do eſtabliſh prelacy, or the ſuperiority of church officers above preſbyters. And the king and queen's majeſties do declare, that they, with the advice and conſent of the eſtates of parliament, will ſettle by law, that church government in this kingdom which is moſt agreeable to the inclinations of the people.' And thus the great grievance of the nation was removed.

The next ſeſſion of parliament, to which the earl of Melvil was his majeſty's high commiſſioner, carried this farther: for, by their firſt act, they reſcinded act 1. parl. 2. Charles II. viz. the act aſſerting his majeſty's ſupremacy, as inconſiſtent with preſbyterian government, and what ought to be abrogated. By their 2d act they reſtored preſbyterian miniſters thruſt from their charges ſince 1661. By their 5th act they ratified the Confeſſion of Faith, and ſettled preſbyterian government. By their 23d act they aboliſhed patronages. By their 27th and 28th they repealed the laws for conformity, and ſeveral other unjuſt acts during the two laſt reigns; And, in one word they reverſed all the acts by which ſo many had been forfeited. And thus an end was put to a moſt cruel and bloody perſecution, and the church of Scotland reſtored to the freedom of her government, by general aſſemblies, ſynods, preſbyteries, and church-ſeſſions, as ſhe was ſettled by the 114th act, Ja. VI. parl. 12. 1592.

From the whole, it appears that all the true members of the church of Scotland, nay, and all true hearty proteſtants, have unſpeakable reaſon to bleſs God for the remarkable interpoſition of his providence at this revolution. Muſt not the hand of God be owned in preſerving a people even in the furnace, to be inſtrumental in bringing about ſuch a glorious event? By this an end was put to perſecution on the one hand, and ſlavery on the other; by this the religious and civil rights of the people were reſtored, nay, and the proteſtant ſucceſſion eſtabliſhed for tranſmitting theſe things to poſterity. But then it was but too evident that due care was not then, nor has to this day been taken to improve thoſe invaluable bleſſings then beſtowed upon us. May a good and gracious God give all ranks and degrees of perſons a ſenſe of their departures from him, revive a work of reformation, and appear glorious in theſe iſlands.

The LIFE of ROBERT BOLTON, who died Anno Chriſti, 1631.

ROBERT Bolton was born at Blackborn in Lancaſhire, Anno Chriſti 1572. His parents finding in him a great promptneſs to learning, though they had no great means, yet they intended him for a ſcholar, the rather having an opportunity of a good ſchoolmaſter in the town, where he profited exceedingly, and at twenty years old, he went to Lincoln college in Oxford, and was maiſter Randal's pupil (afterwards a famous preacher) there in a ſhort time (being well grounded before, and induſtrious) he became an excellent logician, and philoſopher. But about that time his father dying, and his means failing, he took exceſſive pains, and wanting books, he borrowed of his tutor, and others, read them over, and abridged them; and to perfect his knowledge in the Greek, he wrote out all Homer with intollerable pains, ſo that he could with as much facility diſpute in the ſchools in Greek, as in Latin or Engliſh.

From thence he removed to Braſen-noſe college, becauſe the fellowſhips in that houſe belonged to Lancaſhire, and Cheſhire men; yet for want of acquaintance, he ſtayed long without a fellowſhip, which made him to languiſh through want; but his deſerts being known, Dr Bret, and ſome others, together with ſome ſmall ſtipends he had for his lectures in that houſe, ſupported him, till he got a fellowſhip, about the thirtieth year of his age; then alſo he commenced maſter of arts, and being choſen lecturer, he performed it with ſuch exactneſs, that he grew very famous. His diſputations in the univerſity were performed with ſuch acuteneſs of wit, and profound learning, that he was choſen by the vice-chancellor (at king James's firſt coming to the univerſity) to be one of the diſputants before him, and to read natural philoſophy in the public ſchools: he was alſo well ſtudied in metaphyſics, mathematics, and ſchool-divinity; yet all this while he had nothing in him for religion, he loved ſtage-plays, cards, dice, was a horrible ſwearer, Sabbath breaker, and boon companion; he neither loved goodneſs, nor good men. Yet hearing the fame of Mr Perkins, he went to Cambridge at a coma commencement that he might hear him preach, and having heard him, said, 'That he was a barren empty fellow, and a paſſing mean ſcholar; but when God changed his heart, he changed his tune, and ſaid, 'That Mr Perkins was as learned, and godly a divine as our church hath in many years enjoyed in ſo young a man.

He had familiar acquaintance with one Mr Anderton, a good ſcholar, his countryman, and formerly his ſchool-fellow, but a ſtrong papiſt, yea, a prieſt; this man knowing Mr Bolton's good parts, and outward wants, took that advantage to perſuade him to go over with him to the Engliſh ſeminary at Rome, where he ſhould be furniſhed with all neceſſaries, and have gold enough. This motion he accepted of, and a day, and place was appointed in Lancaſhire, to take ſhipping from thence, and be gone; thither Mr Bolton repaired at the time prefixed, but Anderton came not, whereby eſcaping that ſnare, he returned to Oxford, where he fell into acquaintance with Mr Peacock, a learned and godly man, whereby it pleaſed God to bring him to repentance, but by ſuch a way as the Lord ſeldom uſeth, but upon ſuch ſtrong veſſels, as he intendeth for ſtrong encounters, and rare employments, for the Lord ran upon him as a giant, taking him by the neck, and ſhaking him to pieces, as he did Job; beating him to the ground, as he did Paul, by laying before him the ugly viſage of his ſins, which lay ſo heavy upon him that he roared for anguiſh of heart; yea, it ſo affrighted him, that he roſe ſometimes out of his bed in the night, for very anguiſh of ſpirit; and to augment his ſpiritual miſery, he was aſſaulted with foul temptations, Horribilia de Deo, terribilia de fide, which Luther called colaphum Satanæ. This continued for many months, but God at laſt gave a bleſſed iſſue, and theſe grievous pangs in his new-birth produced two admirable effects in him: an invincible courage in the cauſe of God; and ſingular dexterity in comforting afflicted ſpirits. Hereupon he reſolved to enter into the miniſtry, and was accordingly ordained the thirty fifth year of his age; and about two years after, the perſonage of Broughton in Northamptonſhire falling void, ſergean Nicols the patron, preferred him to it.

About the fortieth year of his age he married miſtreſs Anne Bois of an ancient family in Kent, and to her care committed the ordering of his outward eſtate, and applied himſelf wholly to his ſtudies, and the work of the miniſtry, and for twenty years together preached twice every Lord's day, and catechiſed; and on every holy-day, and Friday before the ſacrament, he expounded a chapter, whereby he went over moſt of the hiſtorical books of the Old and New Teſtament; and therein prepared nothing for his people, but what might have ſerved a very learned auditory.

In all his preaching, next after God's glory, he aimed at the converſion of ſouls, and God crowned his labours by making him an inſtrument to beget many ſons, and daughters unto righteouſneſs. He had an excellent art in relieving afflicted conſciences, ſo that he was ſought to far, and near; yea, divers that lived beyond ſea deſired his reſolution in divers caſes of conſcience. Though in his preaching he was a ſon of thunder, yet to thoſe that mourned in ſpirit, he was a ſweet ſon of conſolation, with a tender heart pouring the oil of mercy into their bleeding wounds. He had a ſingular ſkill in diſcovering Satan's ſleights, and in battering down his kingdom. In all his ſermons he uſed to diſcover the filthineſs of ſin, and to preſs hard upon the conſcience the duties of ſanctification; yea, he would ſpare none, great or ſmall, in their ſins; yet in reproving ſin, he never perſonated any man to put him to ſhame.

His life was ſo blameleſs that he could not juſtly be taxed by any, of any ſcandalous ſin. He prayed conſtantly ſix times a-day; twice with his family, twice with his wife, and twice in ſecret. He kept many days of private humiliation; always before the ſacrament, and upon the occaſions of the miſeries of the church at home, and abroad, which he performed with much ardency of ſpirit; and being adviſed by phyſicians, for his healths ſake, to break off the ſtrong intentions of his ſtudies, he rejected their counſel, accounting it greater riches to enjoy Chriſt, by thoſe fervent intentions of his mind, than to remit them for his healths ſake.

He was of a comely preſence, his countenance was ſo mixed with gravity, and auſterity, that it commanded reſpect from others. He oft refuſed preferment, that he might not be divorced from that country where his miniſtry found ſuch entertainment, and effect. He was univerſally bountiful; but eſpecially he exceeded in thoſe public diſtreſſes of Germany, France, Bohemia, &c. He always ſpent all the revenues of his living (which was of good value) in the maintainance of his family, hoſpitality, and charity.

He fell ſick of a quartane ague in September, Anno Chriſti 1631, whereupon finding his diſeaſe to get ſtrength, and his vigor to grow weaker, he reviſed his will, and then wholly retired himſelf from the world, and ſolaced his ſoul with the meditation of the joys of heaven; and having compiled a diſcourſe de quatuor noviſſimis; of death, judgment, hell, and heaven; having preached over the three former, he told his people, that the next day he would preach of heaven, but the Saturday before he fell ſo ſick that he never preached after. Though his ſickneſs was long and ſharp, yet he bore it with admirable patience; often breathing forth theſe ſpeeches, 'O when will this good hour come! when ſhall I be diſſolved! when ſhall I be with Chriſt?' Being told that it was better for the church (if God would) for him to ſtay here, he anſwered, 'If I ſhall find favour in the eyes of God he will bring me again, and ſhew me both it, and his habitation, and if otherwiſe, lo here I am, let him do what ſeemeth good in his eyes, 2 Sam. xv. 25, 26.' And being aſked of another, if he could be content to live if God would grant it him; he ſaid, 'I grant that life is a great bleſſing of God, neither will I neglect any means that may preſerve it, and do heartily deſire to ſubmit to God's will, but of the two I infinitely more deſire to be diſſolved, and to be with Chriſt.' To thoſe that came to viſit him in his ſickneſs, he gave very godly and wiſe exhortations. He thanked God for his wonderful mercy in pulling him out of hell, in ſealing his miniſtry by the converſion of ſouls, which he wholly aſcribed to his glory. A week before his death he called for his wife, and deſired her to bear his diſſolution with a chriſtian fortitude; and turning to his children, he told them, that they ſhould not now expect, that in regard of his weakneſs, he ſhould ſay any thing to them; he had formerly told them enough, and hoped they would remember it, and he verily believed that none of them durſt think to meet him at the great tribunal of Chriſt in an unregenerate ſtate. Some of his neighbours moved, that as he had in his miniſtry diſcovered to them the exceeding comforts that were in Chriſt, ſo he would now tell them what he felt in his ſoul; 'Alas! ſaid he, do you look for that now from me, that want breath and power to ſpeak? I have told you enough in my miniſtry; yet to ſatisfy you, I am, by the wonderful mercies of God, as full of comfort as my heart can hold, and feel nothing in my ſoul but Chriſt, with whom I heartily deſire to be.' Then ſeeing ſome weeping, he ſaid, 'O what a deal ado there is before one can die?' When the very pangs of death were upon him, ſome of his dear friends coming to take their leave of him, he cauſed himſelf to be raiſed up, and after a few gapings for breath, he ſaid to them, 'I am now drawing on apace to my diſſolution; hold out faith, and patience, your work will quickly be at an end.' Then ſhaking them by the hand, he deſired them to make ſure of heaven, and to remember what he had formerly taught them, proteſting that it was the truth of God, as he ſhould anſwer it at the tribunal of Chriſt, before whom he ſhould ſhortly appear: and a dear friend taking him by the hand, aſked him if he felt not much pain: 'Truly no (ſaid he) the greateſt I feel is your cold hand;' and then being laid down again, not long after he yielded up his ſpirit unto God, Anno Chriſti 1631, and of his age 60.

He was one of a thouſand for piety and courage, which were ſo excellently mixed with wiſdom, that they who imagined miſchief againſt his miniſtry, were never able by all their plottings to do him any more hurt, than only to ſhew their teeth.

He wrote a diſcourſe of true happpineſs. Directions for a comfortable walking with God. Inſtructions for comforting afflicted conſciences. A threefold treatiſe, of the word, ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper, and faſting, De quatuor noviſſimis.

The

The LIFE of ZISCA, who died Anno Chriſti, 1424.

ZIſca was born in Troſnovia, in the kingdom of Bohemia, of an ancient, and noble family, and from his youth was brought up in the king's court, and was much employed in military affairs; wherein he profited ſo well, that he became an able, and ſkilful captain; and fighting valiantly in a battle againſt his enemies, he loſt one of his eyes; but it pleaſed God to recompence that outward loſs by enlightening his mind with the knowledge of the truth, by the help of Wickliff's books (at this time riſe in Bohemia) and by the miniſtry of John Hus, and Hierom of Prague were ſo cruelly, and unjuſtly burned by the counſellor of Conſtance, to the diſhonour of the Bohemian nation, and king Wenceſlaus, that had permitted it, dying ſhortly after; Ziſca reſolved to revenge the wrongs which the council had done to them, upon their complices and adherents, and for that end he raiſed an army of forty thouſand proteſtants, by whoſe help he ſubverted the monaſteries, and their idolatrous temples, pulling down, and breaking in pieces their images, and idols, driving away the prieſts, and monks, which he ſaid, were kept up in their cloiſters, like ſwine in a ſtie to be fatted, then he attempted to take the caſtle of Wiſegrade, and being not able preſently to carry it, he left part of his army before it, and marched with the reſt to Pelzina, where were many proteſtants, which town he took in, and fortified the ſame very ſtrongly, and in the mean time his party that he left behind him, took in the caſtle of Wiſegrade.

Hereupon the queen ſent to the emperor, and to other nobles adjoining to her, for help. But the emperor being preparing to go againſt the Turk, that had lately taken ſome caſtles from him, could not aſſiſt her. She therefore taking all the king's treaſure, fortified the caſtle of Prague, and the leſſer city adjoining unto it; making gates, and towers upon the bridge over the river, to ſtop the paſſage of the proteſtants that way; in the mean time the number of proteſtants encreaſing in Prague, they fought for the bridge ſo furiouſly, that many were ſlain on both parts, but at length the Huſſites won the bridge, and the nether part of the leſſer Prague; the popiſh party for the queen flying into the upper part, and then turning again, the battle was renewed, where they fought continually, day, and night, for five days together; but during this bickering, ambaſſadors came from the emperor, which made a truce amongſt them, and agreed that certain places being by Ziſca delivered back into their hands, they ſhould ſend ambaſſadors to the emperor Sigiſmund, to treat with him about the ſettling of their eſtate. This both ſides conſented to, and thereupon peace enſued for the preſent: but the emperor being now at better leiſure, that he might ſhow his zeal for the popiſh cauſe, and perform his promiſe to the fathers at the council of Conſtance, raiſes a great army, wherewith he reſolved to root out all the Huſſites in Bohemia, but before he enters into that kingdom, he goes with his army to Uratiſlavia, the chief city in Sileſia, where he baniſhed ſome, impriſoned others, ſeized upon the eſtate of others, and many he put to cruel deaths, and all this (as himſelf gave out) that he might ſtrike a terror into the Bohemians, and make them obedient to the church of Rome; this coming to the ears of the Bohemians, and they ſhortly after meeting with ſome of the emperor's letters, wherein he wrote, that he would come ſpeedily, and rule them after the ſame order, and manner as his father Charles had done before him. Thereupon they ſeeing that their religion, liberty, and all that was dear to them, lay at ſtake, reſolve to arm for their own defence, and to repel unjuſt tyranny by lawful force, and choſe this noble Ziſca for their general; and drawing the governor of the caſtle of Prague, Gencho, to their part, they ſent letters into all the realm, that no man ſhould ſuffer the emperor to enter, who was an enemy to Bohemia, ſeeking nothing elſe but to deſtroy the kingdom, and one that had put by the marquis of Brandenburg, whom they had choſen for their king, and had not only ſuffered John Hus, and Hierom of Prague to be burned at the council of Conſtance, contrary to his faith given, but had alſo procured the ſame, and with all his endeavour ſought to extirpate the doctrine, and faith which they taught, and followed: in the mean time Ziſca was ſet upon by the imperialiſts, who were all horſemen, and Ziſca's ſoldiers were all on foot; the place where they fought was rough, and rugged, ſo that the horſemen were fain to alight, and fight on foot; hereupon Ziſca commanded all the women that followed his army, to throw their kerchiefs on the ground, wherein the horſemen being intangled by their ſpurs, were ſlain before they could unlooſe their feet; and by this policy he got a great victory over them; then he went to Auſca, out of which town, Ulricius, a papiſt, had caſt out the proteſtants.

This place Ziſca took by ſtorm, ſet it on fire, and razed it: he took alſo a caſtle which was five miles off, whither Ulricius was fled, putting him, and all his family, ſave one, to the ſword; then conſidering that he had no walled, or fenced town to inhabit, he choſe out a mountain that was fenced by nature between two rivers; this place he compaſſed in with walls, commanded his followers to build them houſes, where they had pitched them tents, and named the city Thabor, and the inhabitants his followers, Thaborites; the way to it by land was ſcarce thirty foot broad, in which neck of land he made a deep trench, and a triple wall of ſuch thickneſs, that it could not be broken with an engine. At this time the Thaborites had no horſemen, but the emperor ſending one of his officers with a thouſand horſemen into Bohemia to reſiſt Ziſca, he fell upon them in their quarters in the night, took away all their horſes and armour, and ſet the town on fire where they lay; and then he taught his ſoldiers to mount on horſeback; to leap, run, turn, caſt in a ring, ſo that after this, he never led an army without his wings of horſemen: in the mean time the emperor Sigiſmund gathering together the nobles of Sileſia, entered into Bohemia with a great army, marched to Prague, and enticed Gencho that kept the caſtle, to ſurrender it to him; hereupon the citizens of Prague ſent for Ziſca, who came with his Thaborites to aſſiſt them, and received the city under his government. His firſt deſign was to beſiege the caſtle, which was ſo ſtrongly fenced, that it could not be forced but by famine, whereupon he blocked up all the paſſages to it; but the emperor coming with a very great army, opened them again, and laid ſiege to the city of Prague, and aſſaulted it often for ſix weeks; he ſent out alſo a part of his army to ſeize upon the tents of the Thaborites, againſt whom Ziſca ſent forth ſome power under the command of Nich. Hus, who beat the imperialiſts, and took in Gracium, the queen's city alſo. Near to Prague there is an high hill, on the top whereof Ziſca planted a ſtrong garriſon, that it ſhould not come into the power of his enemies:

Againſt this garriſon the emperor ſent the marquis of Miſnia, with many ſoldiers, who getting to the top of the hill, were ſo luſtily ſet upon by Ziſca's men, that they were beaten into a corner, where the rock was very craggy, and ſteep, and there they ſet fiercely upon them, that when the Miſnians could no longer reſiſt, they were driven down the ſteep rock, where they were broken to pieces. Hereupon the emperor, raiſing his ſiege, departed, and Ziſca with his men returned to Thabor. But conſidering that the popiſh clergy in Bohemia were the procurers of the cruel burning of John Hus, and Hierom of Prague at Conſtance, and that now alſo they had ſet on the emperor againſt the Huſſites, helpt to pay his army, and had joined with him in murthering the innocent ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt, drowning ſome, roaſting others before a ſoft fire, thruſting others into the metal mines; yea, that their malice, and hatred was grown to that height, that they ſold them like cattle, giving a Florence for an ordinary chriſtian, and five Florences for a miniſter, whom they excruciated with all manner of torments; he thereupon reſolved to pay them back in their own coin, and in proſecution thereof, he burnt, deſtroyed, and overthrew three hundred monaſteries, and amongſt the reſt the famous monaſtery called the king's court, a mile from Prague, in the walls whereof the whole bible was moſt exquiſitely written in letters of gold; the monks, and friars he drave out, and cauſed either to betake themſelves to labour, or to ſeek to other places for ſhelter.

Shortly after he took in many places, and then beſieged the caſtle of Viſgrade, the beſieged were brought to great ſtraits, inſomuch as they were forced to live upon their horſes; at length they came to compoſition, that if they were not relieved by the emperor by a certain day, they ſhould ſurrender the caſtle to him; the emperor hearing hereof, marched to the relief of it with a ſtrong army, but entering into a narrow paſſage near the caſtle, he was ſuddenly ſet upon by the proteſtants, who gave him a great overthrow, which cauſed him depart without effecting his purpoſe, and ſo the caſtle was ſurrendered to Ziſca; preſently after he took one of the Imperial captains in a ſtrong town; he alſo took, and burned down five monaſtries, and ſat down before the ſtrong monaſtry of Saint Clare. Thither alſo came the emperor with a great army, but when Ziſca drew forth his power againſt him, he moſt cowardly fled, and departed out of Bohemia: From thence Ziſca went with his army to the famous city of Commitavia, which he took by ſtorm, burning all the prieſts therein; then he beſieged the ſtrong town of Raby, where he was ſtricken with an arrow in the eye, and ſo was carried to Prague to the phyſicians, who cured him of his wound, but he loſt his ſight, and ſo was ſtark blind, yet would he not leave his army, but ſtill took the charge of them; after this the proteſtants took many of the emperors garriſons, which cauſed him to ſend to all the princes electors to raiſe forces, and to join with him for the ſubduing of the Bohemians: himſelf with an army of Hungarians entred on the eaſt part of Bohemia, and he appointed the electors to enter on the weſt; the emperor at his firſt coming took in ſome towns. But when Ziſca (although he was blind) came towards him, he was in a great fear, yet a battle was fought, wherein Ziſca ſlew many of his nobles, and common ſoldiers, inſomuch as the emperor fled, and Ziſca purſuing of him a day's journey, got great and rich ſpoils; in his return, he took the ſtrong town of Broba by force, and burned it down, ſo that it lay deſolate for fourteen years after; the emperor in his flight made ſuch haſte, that himſelf paſſing over a bridge, Piſo, a Florentine, that had brought fifteen thouſand horſe out of Hungary to theſe wars, adventuring to paſs the river upon the ice, the ice breaking by reaſon of the number and weight of the horſemen, moſt of them were there drowned, at which time and place, periſhed a great number of the Hungarian nobility.

Ziſca having obtained this victory, would not ſuffer any images, or idols to continue in the churches, neither would he ſuffer the prieſts to wear copes and veſtiments; after this Ziſca marched with a great army into Auſtria, where the huſbandmen drave, and carried a great number of their cattle into an iſland in the river Danubius, but leaving, for haſte, ſome calves, and ſwine behind them, Ziſca cauſed his ſoldiers to drive them to the river's ſide, where they made them, roar and bleat, which the cattle in the iſland hearing, ſwam over to them, whereby Ziſca got a great booty, and ſo returned home. Then the emperor delivered to the marquis of Miſnia, the bridge, and town of Aſca upon the river Albis, to plant a ſtrong garriſon in; thither Ziſca went, and beſieged it; whereupon the marquis raiſed a great army out of Saxony, Thuringia, Miſnia, and both the Alſatia's to relieve the beſieged: Ziſca fought a great battle with them, the victory remaining doubtful for a great while, but it pleaſed God at laſt to make the proteſtants conquerors, in which battle Ziſca ſlew many noblemen, and nine thouſand of the common ſoldiers, and thereupon Aſca was ſurrendered to him, which he utterly razed: at laſt there aroſe ſome diſſention between them of Prague and Ziſca; whereupon they raiſed a great army againſt him, and he knowing himſelf to be too weak to withſtand them, retreated into certain mountains, but when his enemies purſued him into a narrow plain, he knowing that they could not ſpread out their army in that place, commanded his ſtandard to ſtand ſtill, exhorting, and encouraging his men to give them battle, which accordingly they did.

The battle was very fierce, and cruel on both ſides, yet at laſt Ziſca had the upper hand, and ſlew three thouſand of them, putting the reſt to flight, and ſtrait he took the city of Cuthna by force, which they of Prague had garriſoned, and burnt it down, and ſo with all ſpeed he marched with his army to beſiege Prague; but his ſoldiers being not pleaſed with it, began to murmur, ſaying, that it was not reaſonable that the regal city ſhould be oppreſſed, eſpecially not diſſenting from them in opinion; that the emperor would make great advantage of theſe their diviſions, &c.

Theſe ſpeeches coming to Ziſca's ears, he called together his army, and ſpake thus unto them, 'Brethren, blame not me that have ſought your health and ſafety; the victories that you have obtained under my conduct are yet freſh in memory, neither have I at any time brought you to a place from which you have not gone conquerors: you are become famous, and rich, and I for your ſakes have loſt my ſight, and dwell in darkneſs: I have got nothing to myſelf but a vain name; for you have I fought, and vanquiſhed, &c. I do not perſecute them of Prague for mine own cauſe; it's your blood that they thirſt after, it would avail them little to deſtroy me, an old and blind man; it's your valour and courage which they fear; either you or they muſt periſh; civil ſedition is dangerous, let us ſubdue Prague, and baniſh the ſeditious citizens before the emperor hear of it, and then when but few of his faction are left, we may fear him the leſs; but, becauſe you ſhall accuſe me no more, I give you free liberty to do what you will. If you will let them of Prague alone, I will not be againſt it, ſo there be no treaſon wrought; if you determine of war, I am alſo ready; look which part you incline to, Ziſca will be your aid and helper.

Upon this ſpeech, the ſoldiers minds were changed, ſo that ſpeedily betaking themſelves to their arms, they ran to the city walls, to provoke their enemies to fight: Ziſca in the mean time provided all things ready for the aſſault; but it pleaſed God to ſtir up one of the city miniſters, called Johannes de Rochezana, famous for his life and learning, by the conſent of the citizens to go out to Ziſca, and he dealt ſo effectually betwixt them, that he reconciled them to other, and ſo put an end to that diſcord. The Emperor conſidering the wonderful ſucceſs that God gave to Ziſca in all his undertakings, and that the whole ſtate of Bohemia did depend upon him alone, he ſent to him, promiſing him the government of the whole kingdom, and making many other large promiſes if he would come to him, &c. Hereupon Ziſca began his journey towards the emperor, but it pleaſed God by the way that he fell ſick at the caſtle of Priſcavia, where he alſo died, 1424.

Eneas Silvius (afterwards Pope) complains, that to the great diſhonour of the imperial majeſty, and diſgrace to the catholick religion, Sigiſmund, born of an empreſs, and himſelf an emperor, whoſe name was ſo famous, and ſo much feared in Italy, France, and Germany, yea amongſt the very Turks themſelves, ſhould thus baſely, and unworthily truck with an old blind man, by promiſing him gold, government, and what not, if he would but ſubmit unto him.

In the time of his ſickneſs, his attendants demanded of him, where he would be buried, whom he commanded to pull the ſkin from his dead corpſe, and to make a drum of it, which they ſhould uſe in their battles, affirming, that as ſoon as their enemies ſhould hear the ſound of that drum, they would not abide, but preſently flie away: he was buried honourably at Caſtavia, by his Thaborites; but Anno Chriſti 1623. the popiſh army under the emperor Ferdinand, two hundred years after, coming into the church, and ſeeing the epitaph upon his tomb-ſtone, they brake it in pieces, and digging up the duſt of his grave, they carried it out, and ſcattered it abroad in the wind, raging againſt him ſo long after his death, whom they could never overcome in his life.

In the life time of king Wenceſlaus, he had a purpoſe of diſarming the citizens of Prague for ſome offence that he took againſt them, which Ziſca hearing of, called together the citizens, bidding them arm themſelves and follow him; which they doing, he went preſently with them to the king in his caſtle, who being aſtoniſhed at their ſo ſudden coming in that manner, Ziſca ſaid to him, 'Sir, where are thoſe enemies which your majeſty fears; for theſe your faithful ſubjects, and citizens of Prague are reſolved to ſpend their blood in the defence of their king,' whereupon the king diſmiſſed them, and the citizens kept their arms, and were freed from their fears.
